[C] Barcochebas is said to have made use of the same Trick with Eunus — — — that is, he was thought to vomit Fire. This we learn from St Jerome. "Tu videlicet flammeus, immo fulmineus qui in loquendo fulminas. Atque ut ille Barchochebas auctor seditionis Judæicæ stipulam in ore successam anhelitu ventilabat, ut flammam evomeret videretur (5). — — — Thou hast not only the command of Fire, but also of Thunder, in thy Words. And as Barcochebas, that Ringleader of the Jewish Rebellion, kindled Straw in his Mouth, and ventilated the Flame with his Breath, that he might be thought to vomit it." Here is a Man, whose Words were Fire and Flame, not only in a figurative, but literal, Sense. As for Eunus, see what Florus says of him: "Syrys quidam nomine Eunus (magnitudo cladum facit ut meminerimus) fanatico furore simulato dum Syriæ deæ comas jactat, ad libertatem & arma servos quasi numinum imperio concitavit; idque ut divinitus fieri probaret in ore abdita nuce, quam sulphure & igne stipaverat, leniter inspirans flammam inter verba fundebat (6). — — — A certain Syrian, named Eunus (the prodigious Slaughter he occasioned makes me mention him) counterfeiting a divine Inspiration, while he pretends to brandish a Lock of Hair of the Syrian Goddess, he excited the Slaves to assert their Liberty, and take up Arms, as it were by the Command of the Gods; and that he might prove his Commission, having artfully conveyed into his Mouth some Fire and Sulphur, in a Nutshell, he gently breathed out the Flames as he spoke." This is an Example to shew Sovereign Princes, how dangerous those Per-of Bitter for his place of Arms, and the Seat of his Empire. It is said, that, to try the Courage of his Followers, he required them to cut off one of their Fingers, and on the Remonstrances, which were made him, he left off that Test, and made use of another Invention [D]. He ravaged a great number of places, and massacred a Multitude of Persons: He was particularly barbarous towards the Christians [E]. The Emperor, being informed of these Violences, sent some Troops to Rufus Governor of Judæa, with Orders for the immediate suppressing This Sedition (d). Rufus, in obedience to this Order, exercised a thousand Cruelties, but yet could not obtain his End. The Emperor was forced to re-call Julius Severus, the greatest Captain of those Times, from England, and commit to him the whole Conduct of That War (e). This General gained his Point against the Jews, without giving them a general Battle. He attacked them after another manner, as well because of their great number, as also because he saw them fight like desperate Men. He chose therefore rather to charge them separately, to cut off their Provisions, to shut them up, and straighten them (f); and at last, all was reduced to the Siege of Bitter, in the eighteenth Year of Adrian (g). The great number of Jews, who threw themselves into that City, was the cause of their making a very long Defence, and being reduced to great Extremities by Famine (h). After the taking of that place, the War was not quite ended, but did not continue long: Barcochebas perished in it (i), and the Jews have not failed to invent some Fables about it [F]. The manner, in which Adrian dispersed the Remains of that unhappy Nation, was very cruel [G]. But all the sons are to a State, who pretend to Inspiration. This last enthusiastic Impostor raised an Insurrection of above Sixty thousand Men, and gave the Roman People a great deal of Trouble.

Stories,

[D] It is said that he tried his Followers, by obliging them to cut off a Finger, — and that he made use of another Invention. It is reported, that he drew Two hundred thousand Men after him, who had cut off one of their Fingers, to make Proof of their Courage. The wise Men, not approving such a Mutilation, deputed some Persons to him, to know how long he would thus mangle the Jewish Nation, usque quo tute Judæos mancus efficit? He answered, How then would you have me try their Strength? They replied, That he should enroll none, but those, who could pull up, with their Hands, a Cedar from Mount Libanus. He took their Counsel, and found Two hundred thousand Men more, who gave this proof of their Strength (7). You will say, these are Jewish Fables. It is true, and as such I relate them; and, for that Reason, they belong the more properly to this Dictionary.

[E] He was particularly barbarous towards the Christians. Indeed he made a great Slaughter of the Gentiles, but he did not force them to renounce their Religion. He play'd the part of a Converter, only towards the Christians; I say of a Dragooning Converter, and, perhaps, worse (8); for he condemned all those to Death, who would not forsake JESUS CHRIST, and load him with Curfes. Justin Martyr has complained of this: Proximo namque bello Judæicos Barcochebas defensionis Judæorum dux & princeps, solos Christianos ad gravia supplicia nisi Christum abnegarent & maledictis incesferent, probravit (9). David Gans does not deny, but that those of his Nation spilled whole Torrents of Blood (10). I am even of Opinion, that he represents their Executions much more dreadful than they actually were. He pretends, that, in the City of Alexandria alone, they killed above Two hundred thousand Persons, and that, in the Island of Cyprus, and the parts adjacent, they did not leave one Man alive. Tunc Judæi Bitterenses regerunt cum (Barcocheban) & elegerunt ipsum in unum super se, jugum Romanorum abjicientes. Occiderunt ex Romanis & Græcis qui in Africa innumerales: insular arena maris, similiter fecerunt Aegyptiis: incolæ urbis Alexandrinæ etiam ex Romanis interfecerunt ultra bis centena millia. Qui in Cypris, occiderunt omnes plane gentes vicinas, ut ne superstes quidem remaneret. See what will be said hereafter (11), concerning the omission of a Common Form in Adrian's Letters. O religious Wars, how horrible are your Cruelties!

[F] The Jews have not failed to invent Fables on the Death of Barcochebas. They say, that, after the taking of Bitter, Barcochebas's Head was brought to the Emperor Adrian, and that he asked who had killed him? and that he ordered the Soldier, who replied, It was I, to go and fetch the Body. The Soldier, being come to the Place, found a Serpent round Barcochebas's Neck. The Emperor having viewed the Body, said, If this Man had not been killed by his own God, who could have hurt him (12)?

[G] The Manner, in which Adrian dispersed the Remains of that unhappy Nation. I have a great deal of Reason to make use of the Word Remains; for the Number of Jews, who perished in that War, is not to be expressed. The Abbreviator of Dio relates, that they had fifty Fortresses, and Nine hundred and eighty five very considerable Boroughs, razed; that they had lost Five hundred and eighty thousand Men in Battles and Inroads, and that the Number of those, who perished by Famine, Sickness, and Fire, is infinite: So that almost all Judæa remained without Inhabitants (13). Let us now see what was done with those, who happened to survive to great a Desolation. "An incredible Number of all Ages and Sexes * were sold at the same Price as * Horses, in a very famous Fair, called the Fair of the Turpentine Tree †. Wherefore the Jews had an Abhorrence for that Fair. ----- Those, who could not be sold there, were brought to Gaza †, and exposed to Sale in another Market, established there by Adrian, and which, the Chronicle of Alexander says, is yet called Adrian's Market. Those, they could not sell in Palestine, were transported into Egypt †, where they perished by Shipwrecks, and by Famine, or were killed by the Pagans. ----- When the War was ended, Adrian prohibited the Jews, by an Edict publicly fixed up , from returning to Jerusalem, on pain of Death ††, and Guards were purposely placed there, to hinder them from entering it ††. That Law denied them even the Liberty of coming near it, or of being in any Place, where they might have a Sight of it ††. Turtullian *, and St Jerom †, go yet further, and extend That Prohibition all over Judæa; and the Jews seem to agree to it, when they speak of the Fast, which they instituted on account of That Decree, whereby their Fathers had been forbidden to come into the Country of Judæa †. The Author, of whom I borrow This Passage, with all its Quotations (14), makes a Remark on the Fair of the Turpentine Tree. He observes, that "St Jerom says †, in a certain Place, that the Jews were sold, at Abraham's Tent, where is kept, says he, an annual Fair, very much frequented. This is not difficult to be granted, for, in the Place, where Abraham had lived, in the Valley of Mamre [near Hebron], and where he entertained three Angels, there was remaining, in the IVth Century a Turpentine Tree, which the People of the Country said had been there from the Creation of the World." See the Remark [G] of the Article ABRAHAM: Let us return to the Calamity of the Jews. Some Authors say, that Adrian caused their Ears to be cut off, and transported them into Spain (15). Stories, the Rabbins tell on this Subject, are not to be credited [H]. This War cost the Romans a great many Lives (k). If I mention in the Remarks several Facts, which concern this War, it is because the Article of Hadrian refers to them, and there was a necessity of shortening, as much as possible, That Emperor's Article, by means of This Reference. The Jewish Authors suppose, that Adrian was personally in that War [I], that he besieged and took the City of Bitter, and that he disputed, with a Rabbi, about the Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Dead [K]. This Fact is very curious; And will be found in the Remarks.

(k) See Remark [E].

Eusebius

very likely, that Part of the Idolatries, which That Emperor established in the new City of Jerusalem, did not begin 'till after the Destruction of Bitter, and the Death of Barcochebas. It was one of the most sensible Shocks, which that unhappy Nation ever had to sustain. Adrian, knowing their Abhorrence for Swine, caused one of Marble to be set up over the Gate, which led to Bethleem . He made use of the Stones of Solomon's Temple ††, for the Building of a Theatre, and several Pagan Temples. Two of his Statues, and some Idols, were set up in the Place, where That Temple stood †. The Statue of Jupiter was set up in the Place of our Saviour's Passion. This is what St Paulinus affirms ††: but, according to St Jerom *, Jupiter's Statue was set up where JESUS CHRIST rose from the Dead, and That of Venus, where he died. The Cavern, where he was born, was profaned by the Temple, and infamous Worship, of Adonis †. See Mr de Tillemont, to whom I am indebted for these Particulars (16).

[H] All the Stories, which the Rabbins tell on This Subject, are not to be credited.] They say, that the Slaughter was to great in Bitter, when the Romans made themselves Masters of it, after a Siege of three Years and a half, that the Horses marched up to the Mouth in Blood (17). They add, that the Blood made so strong a Current, that it carried Stones, of the Weight of four Pounds, along with it, and ran for the Space of four Miles into the Sea. Now Bitter was four Miles from the Sea. Adrian had a Vineyard-plot eighteen Miles long, and as many wide; (it is the Distance from Tiberias to Zipporis) where he made a Fence or Partition with the Bodies of those, who were killed in Bitter: For he would not suffer them to be buried, nor were they buried 'till the Reign of his Successor. There were two Rivers in the Valley of Judaim, running on different Sides of it (18): the Rabbins computed, that the Water made but two thirds, and the Blood the other third, of those Rivers. For seven Years the Gentiles had no need to dung their Vines, they were so richly manured with the Blood of the Jews. The Blood carried away Stones with it of an immense Magnitude, and entered forty Miles into the Sea: Quinimo sanguis rapiebat secum petras magnitudinis quadraginta modiorum, donec ad quadraginta miliaria usque in Oceanum fueret (19). Three hundred Skulls of Children were found on one Stone. There are, in these Rabbinical Expressions, some touches of the Style, which Rabelais makes use of, to represent the Valour and Prowesses of his Garagantua and his Pantagruel. But let us relate one more Story concerning the Slaughter of Bitter. In That City there were Four hundred Colleges, and in each College Four hundred Masters, each of which had Four hundred Disciples, or Scholars in his Class. In the first Attack, the Scholars made use of their Writing Pens (20), to kill their Enemies; but, after the Place was taken, they were packed up with their Books and thrown into the Fire. Ita pubes principio hostes impetum facientes graphiis suis confodiebat: cum vero hi praevalerent, urbem cepissent, involverunt puerulos illos cum libris suis, osque igne sic cremarunt (21). The Jews say, that Adrian destroyed twice as many People of their Nation, as Moses brought out of the Land of Egypt, and they esteem him a greater Persecutor of them, than either Nebuchadnezzar, or Titus (22). One of their best Chronologers affirms, that the Loss, which their Nation sustained in the time of Nebusaraddan, or in the Time of Titus, does not come up to That, which they sustained under the Reign of Adrian; for the Talmud says, that Four Millions of Persons perished at Bitter, quadringentas myriadas. Nevertheless, there is, in the Ritual of the Jews, a Hymn for the ninth Day of the Month Ab, being That of the Date of Adrian's Edict, which prohibited their setting Foot in Judaea: I say there is an Hymn, wherein Nebuchadnezzar and Adrian are equally represented, as two great Scourges of their Nation. That Hymn names them often, but speaks only once of Vespasian and Titus; it mentions Four hundred and eighty Synagogues burnt by Adrian. "Recordare Domine qualis fuissei Adrianus, crudelitatis consilia amplexus, consultu idola se pervertentia. Et sustulit, combussitque quadringentas et octoginta synagogas (23). --- Remember, O Lord, the Sin of Adrian, who, following the Counsels of Cruelty, and listening to Idols, which perverted him, destroyed, and burnt, Four hundred and eighty Synagogues."

[I] The Jewish Authors suppose, that Adrian was personally in That War.] Eusebius says expressly, that the Emperor sent some Troops to the Governor of Judaea, to chastise the Revolt of Barcochebas, and never mentions That Prince's going thither afterwards in Person. The Abbreviator of Dio speaks only of the Generals, who were sent into Judaea by Adrian (24). He remarks, that, during That Emperor's Stay in Egypt and in Syria, the Jews, who were discontented at the Building of Aelia Capitolina, durst not stir, but appeared in Arms openly, as soon as he was gone. He adds, that Adrian sent, against them, the best of his Generals, and particularly Julius Severus. This was a proper Place to say, whether he was present, in Person, when the Rebels were punished; and yet That Writer mentions nothing of it: From whence it seems to follow, that Adrian did not at that time go into Judaea. But, not to conceal any Thing, it must be owned, that Dio makes a Remark, which intimates, that Adrian was present in That War. He says, that the Romans lost so many Men in it, that This Emperor, writing to the Senate did not use the common Preamble, Si vos liberique vestri valitis bene est, ego quidem & exercitus valeamus. — If you, and your Children, are well, it will give me cause to rejoice; I have the Pleasure to assure you of my own Health, and That of the Army. One would think, that a Prince, who begins his Letter with These Words, must be present in the Army; and if he is not, he ought not to make Use of That Compliment, neither in time of Prosperity, nor in Time of Adversity. It does not, therefore, seem likely, that Dio would have made This Observation, if he had thought, that Adrian was near Rome, or very far from the Army, when he wrote to the Senate. This Objection may be easily answered; for, in the first Place, it may be said, that Adrian's Absence was the very Occasion of his not using That Form; from whence it would follow, that Dio did not rightly apprehend all the possible Causes of That Omission, when he ascribed it only to the Loss, which the Roman Army had suffered. It may be said, in the second Place, that an Emperor, who is a great way from his Army, might very well make use of That Form, in a Letter, wherein he acquaints the Senate with the good News, which his Generals have wrote to him. In fine, it might be maintained, against Dio, that the Victory, obtained over the Jews, was so complete, and did so effectually remove all Possibility of a new Insurrection, that, tho' the Roman Army had sustained great Losses, there was room to write to the Senate, according to the Style, commonly used in the News of Prosperity. It is possible, therefore, that This Writer might make a wrong Observation.

[K] And, that he disputed with a Rabbi about the Doctrine of the Resurrection of the dead.] This Fable says, that the chief Difficulty, objected by Adrian, was, that the Parts of a dead Body were dispersed in a thousand Places. He was answered, that there was a small Bone in our Body, which was incorruptible, and that God would restore our Body again out of That little Bone. The Jews pretend, that Eusebius supposes, that Adrian intrusted this War to his Lieutenants (l). It is at least very certain, that Adrian did not command his Uncle Trajan's Troops in Judæa during the Rebellion of Barcochebas. David Gans, the Jewish Historian, is very much mistaken in affirming it (m). Some say, that there were two Barcochebas's, one under Titus, the other under Adrian; and that the first, having failed in the Test required of him, was killed as an Impostor, and a false Messias. Upon his declaring himself to be the Messias, a Passage of Scripture was alledged to him, which imports, according to the Jewish Exposition, that the Messias will be able to discern, by the Smell, whether a Person accused be Innocent or Guilty (n) [L], and it being found, that this pretended Messias had not a Nose good enough to make that distinction, he was put to Death. This Opinion is not much followed (o).

that a celestial Dew will soften That Bone, and make it grow, in the same Manner as a little Leaven raises the whole Mass, or, as a Grain of Wheat shoots into the Ear. Officulum illud dicunt rere quodam caelesti molendum & extendendum ad instar fermenti quod in totum se massam diffundit, vel quemadmodum granum aliqum tritici in crismam se exporrigit (25). Adrian would not believe any thing concerning the Incorruptibility of That Bone; but the Rabbi, with whom he disputed, made a Trial of it; and it resisted every thing, Fire, Water, the Hammer, &c. Here is a long Passage of Manasse Ben-Israel. "Ajunt in spina dor- si aliquod officulum esse, quod nunquam percat: ex isto officulo solo post interitum & annihilationem omnium aliarum partium, dicunt, hominem instauratum, restitutumque iri, in resurrectione mortuorum; juxta illud, quod in Berefit Raba Paraf. 28. legitur; Adrianus (cujus ossa comminuatur) quæ- sitit ex *R. Rursus alter, unde nosti hoc? da mihi illud, inquit ille, officulum, & te docebo: contudit illud in mola, sed non tulit est; conjecit in ignem & non conflagravit; conjecit in aquam, & non attritum est; imposuit incudi, malleoque cecidit; sed ne hilum comminutum est: Imperator Romanus, si- ve quod rideret resurrectionem mortuorum, si- ve quod audiverat aliquod incorruptibile officulum esse in corpore humano, cupiditate ejus sciendi; vel quia, uti verisimile est, hæsiabat ob difficultates eas, quas jam recensimus, quæsitit ex R. Jeosuah filio Hanina, unde, vel quomodo restituerentur mortui, quorum membra tam longe, lateque dispersa essent ac dissipata? Respondit illi R. Jeosuah, ex officulo spinæ dorsii, appellato luz, quod incorruptibile est. Qui cum non posset facile adhibere fidem, experimento ei ostendit ita esse. Hæc opinio, si quid antiquis credimus, non probabilis est. Istud enim officulum tale est, ut nequeat interire, quamvis hodie nullus sit, qui illud noverit. Sunt qui arbitrentur, Davidem hujus officali mentionem facere, cum ait, Custodiens ossa ejus, unum

"— They hold, that there is in the Spine of the Back a little Bone, which never perishes: and that from this little Bone only, after Death and Annihilation of all the other Parts, the whole Man will be renewed, and restored in the Resurrection of the Dead. According to what we meet with in Berefit Raba Paraf. 28; Adrian (whose Bones I wish may all be annihilated) asked Rabbi Jeosuah the Son of Hanina, from whence the human Body was to spring up again for a future State. To which he answered, from Luz, or the little Bone of the Spine. The other replied, how do you know that? I will take that Bone, says he, and shew you: he tried to grind it in a Mill; he threw it into the Fire; he endeavoured to dissolve it in Water; he attempted to break it on an Anvil with a Hammer; but all to no purpose; it remained still the same: The Roman Emperor, either in order to ridicule the Resurrection of the Dead, or to be satisfied of the Truth of what he had heard of the Incorruptibility of a little Bone in the human Body, or which is most probable of all, being puzzled with the Difficulties we mentioned, urged R. Jeosuah, the Son of Hanina, with this Question. Whence, and by what means, shall the Dead be restored, whose Bodies have been dispersed over the Face of the whole Earth? R. Jeosuah answered him, From the little Bone of the Spine, called Luz, which is incorruptible. The Truth of which being doubted, he demonstrated it by Experiment. This opinion, if we have any Faith in Antiquity, is not improbable. For That little Bone is of such a Nature, that it cannot be destroyed, though there is no Body now who knows it. Some have believed, that David had regard to this Bone, when he said, Thou pre- servest his Bones, one of them shall not perish. Psalm xxxiv. 21." These doating Fools should have said, that this little Bone is the true Seat of the Soul.

[L] The Messias will be able to discern by the smell whether a Person accused be Innocent or Guilty.] Compare this with what will be related in the Remark [C] of the Article DEMOCRITUS.

BARDE (JOHN de la), Counsellor of State, Marquis de Marolles, on the River Seine, was Ambassador of France in Switzerland, in the Reign of Lewis XIV. He had been chief Deputy of Mr de Cbavigni, Secretary of State (a). He assisted at the Conferences of Munster, as a Minister of the Second Rank, and some Endeavours were used to have him complimented with the Title of Excellency, but without any Success [A]. He had then been named Embaf- fador

(a) See Wicquefort's Embassador, Tom. 1. pag. 9. 9.

[A] Endeavours were used to have him complimented with the Title of Excellency, at the Treaty of Munster, but without Success. Mr de Wicquefort reports it, and adds, that the Plenipotentiaries of France made their first attempt on the Nuncio, who answered, that he would not do it (1). They pressed him to give Mr de la Barde that Title, and the first Visit. The Reasons he gave for his Refusal were, That he would not set an Example, which no body would follow, nor make Mr de la Barde useless, who was very serviceable to the Assembly. He would indeed have made him useless, because, if he had done him the Honour which was desired, he must have put him under a Kind of Necessity of requiring it from all the other Embassadors, and of not appearing any more if they had refused him, as it would infallibly have happened. The Venetian Ambassador imitated the Nuncio; and so la Barde was obliged to be satisfied with the Honours they were willing to do him. He desired the Emperor's Ministers at Osnabrug to distinguish him from the other Ministers of the second Rank, and since they could not treat him as an Ambassador, not to treat him as a Resident; and provided he was treated in the third Person after the Italian Manner, he should not pretend to the place of Honour in Visits or Conferences. And indeed he could expect no great Distinction, at Munster, or Osnabrug, by virtue of his Credential Letters for the Swiss Cantons. Mr de la Barde complained of an Italian Writer, for misrepresenting this matter, and, to convince him, affirms, that the Plenipotentiaries of France always treated him as an Ambassador, and that they could do no otherwise, since the King's Patent, and all the Letters from Court, gave him that Character. "Avaxius ac Savianus hunc haud secus ac seiplos invicem habere; neque aliter poterant, cum regio diplomate atque omnibus Regis atque Mazzarini ad se atque ad alios litteris legatus esset appellatus. factor to Switzerland. He served France, with great Faithfulness, and Ability, in the whole course of that Embassy. He wrote the History of France in Latin, from the Death of Lewis XIII. to the Year 1652. That History was long expected, as a Master-piece [B]: It was printed, at last, in the Year 1671 (b), and well received by the Public. The Style of it is good; the Narrations are without Flattery, and shew a great Knowledge of the Intrigues of the Cabinet. The Author has Latinised his Name by That of Labardeus. The Latin Names, he gives to others, would puzzle the Reader, had he not taken care to place the French Names in the Margin. He had made a French Translation of this History, which, in the opinion of some good Judges, was very much inferior to the original Latin (c). "As he was very learned, in Matters of Divinity, he also wrote a Book of Controversy, in Latin, against the Opinion of the Protestants, concerning the Eucharist (d) [C]." The Dutch Gazette have informed us, that he died in the Year 1692, being ninety Years of Age. The Addition I would make to the Remark [C] of this Article, will be found below, [D].

A French ... the ... of ...

"accuratus mihi dicendum fuit, quod homo quidam Italicus eâ de re secus scriptis ex alienâ lubidine, atque invidia in Labardeum: nam id illi ipsi tribuere nolum, qui in hujusmodi rebus etiam supra verum alius favit, hos cum Residentes, aut ad minores Principes absque ullo Titulo missi essent, Legatos nihil fecius appellando (2). --- "D'Avant and Servien regarded him as their Equal; nor could they indeed do otherwise, since his Royal Credentials, and all the King's and Mazarine's Letters, both to himself, and other Ministers, styled him Ambassador. It was necessary to be the more particular in this Affair, because it has been misrepresented, by a certain Italian Author, out of Envy and Prejudice to la Barde: For it cannot be ascribed to his Manner of writing, which inclines to the other extrem, and gives the Title of Ambassador to Residents, and such as are sent without a Character to inferior Princes."

[B] His History of France was long expected, as a Master-piece. "Mr de la Barde is preparing a Latin History, which is to shew, that France has either it's Sallust or it's Virgil." This is what Father le Moine thought proper to intimate to the Public, in his Treatise of History.

[C] He wrote a Book of Controversy, in Latin, against the Opinion of the Protestants concerning the Eucharist. This puts me in mind of what I have heard his Grandson, the Abbot of Brion, Canon of Notre-Dame at Paris, say, viz. That he applied himself several Years, with great diligence, to examine the Opinion of some Fathers about That Question, and to compose a large Volume of great Learning; but, all of a sudden, it came into his Head to destroy that great Work, so that one Morning he threw all he had wrote upon that Subject into the Fire.

[D] Here is what I would add to the Remark [C] of this Article. This relates to his Book of Controversy. In a Manuscript Letter of his, to one of his Friends, dated from Solthorn, March 3. 1663, we find these words. "Libellum ad te de re seriâ, imò divinâ, mitto, quo tui otii mei, sicuti prius negotii, ratio conficit: in eo Latinitatem nostram ne quæstiveris, quam de divinis scribendis atque disputandi genus vix patitur. — I send you a Treatise on a serious, and indeed a divine, Subject, that I may shew you the manner of my spending my leisure Hours, as I have formerly done in respect to my busy ones: you must not look for Purity in our Latin, it being scarce consistent with these Divinity Discourses and Disputations." His Friend answers him a little time after in this manner. "Restat ut de opusculo tuo Theologico gratias agam: in hoc solitas elegantiam tuam desideravi; neque verò tu argumenti severitatem excusa: quid enim est tam contumax, quod nitescere, quid tam horridum, quod poliri amenitate istâ tuâ non possis; sed nimirum ingenii Helvetiis scribebas. — I must not forget to thank you for your Piece of Divinity, in which I expected to have found your usual Elegance: the nature of the Subject is no excuse: for what is there so obscure as not to be illustrated, what so rough as not to be polished, by your fine Pen: but you wrote to Helvetian Understandings." This Answer is dated the 19th of the same Month. These Passages will fix the Time of this Book of Controversy to this Year 1663.

BARLETTA (GABRIEL), a Dominican Monk, distinguished himself towards the end of the XVth Century [A], by a manner of Preaching much more becoming a Buffoon, than a Minister of the Gospel. He was born at Barletto (a), in the Kingdom of Naples. Henry Stephens is not the only Person, who exclaimed against his manner of Preaching (b), full of mean Explications, only proper to expose our most venerable Mysteries to contempt; some Roman Catholics have not spared Gabriel Barletta on this Head [B]: And this Censure does

[A] He distinguished himself towards the end of the XVth Century. Altamura, in his Bibliothèque of the Dominicans, places Barletta in the Year 1470; from whence it appears, that Poffevin was mistaken only 200 Years. "Gabriel Barletta, says he

"(1), Neapolitani regni, Apulus, Ordinis autem Dominicani, Theologus & concionator utilis, cum floreret anno 1270. — Gabriel Barletta, of Apulia, in the Kingdom of Naples, of the Dominican Order, a Divine, and able Preacher, flourished in the Year 1270." He adds, that his Sermons were printed several times, before the Edition of Venice, 1571.

[B] Some Roman Catholics have not spared him. Theophilus Raynaud, under the Name of Petrus à Valle Clausa, wrote sharply against Barletta, and reproached him particularly for his impertinent Answer to this Question, How the Woman of Samaria knew that JESUS CHRIST was a Jew? She knew it, says he, by the Circumcision. It must be confessed, that this Critic was not so exact as he ought to have been; for he does not only forget to mention the two other marks, whereby, as Barletta says, That Woman knew JESUS CHRIST to be a Jew; but he also makes Barletta say, that she saw our Lord was circumcised; but it is certain Barletta did not express himself in that manner: "Prima ad habitum quem portabat. --- secunda quia Nazareus in cujus capite novaculum non ascendit. --- tertia ratio ad circumcicionem: nullus alius populus erat circumciscus. — The first Mark was that of his Habit. --- the second, his never having had his Head shaved, as being a Nazarene. --- the third, his Circumcision: no other People were circumcised." It would signify nothing towards the Justification of this Critic, to say, that what he imputes to Barletta may be inferred from his words; for what a Man says ought never to be confounded does much greater Service and Honour to the Catholics, than the Pains the Dominicans take to justify This Preacher [C]. His Sermons were printed at Venice, in the Year 1571, in Two Volumes in 8°. The First Volume contains the Lent Sermons: the Second contains the Sermons on the Advent, Pentecost, Whitsunday, Ascension, and other Festivals (c). He was yet living, when the Turks took Otranto, in the Year 1480 (d). Some of his Friends undertook to justify him, by denying him to be the Author of the Sermons, which passed under his Name [D].

A RULE which those ought to follow, who impute certain things to an Author.

confounded with the Consequences, which may be drawn from what he says. How many things escape not only an Orator, but also an Author, whereof he does not perceive so much as the most immediate Consequences? It is very possible therefore, that this Critic, by imputing to him those Consequences, imputes to him what he never thought of. So that, if a Man will be an exact and faithful Critic, he must prescribe this Rule to himself: "Censure the very words themselves, which are obnoxious, and religiously forbear either to add or suppress a Tittle." Shew the Authors the Consequences, which proceed from them, but do not assert, that they have seen and admitted those Consequences; wait for what they will reply, when they are told, that they follow naturally, and necessarily, from what they have said." I cannot believe, that Barletta could ever have arrived at such a height of Impudence and Extravagance, as to utter the impudrata blasphemia, which his Critic imputes to him, in such fine Latin. It is enough to accuse him of not knowing what he said with his third Mark. I shall therefore leave his Critic to Altamura's Anger. "Pessimè igitur à Valle Clausà fallavit calumniatus Barlettæ sententiam exerbendo: respondit Samaritanam cognovisse Christum esse Judæum videndo eum esse circumcisi. Ubi fraudulento silentio præterivit duas priores rationes, &c. (2). — Valle Clausà, in order to destroy Barletta's Opinion, has most abominably misquoted it, and made him say, 'That the Woman of Samaria knew Christ to be a Jew, by seeing he was circumcised. Where he unjustfully suppresses the two former Reasons before given, &c.' Another of his Sermons was censured with greater exactness. In that, the Question is, why the Holy Ghost deferred his coming into the World for ten Days. Barletta ascribes this to the fear of being served in the same manner as the Son of God was, and makes the Dispute between the Father and the Holy Ghost to end only by this expedient. The Holy Ghost bethought himself to take the Appearance of Wind and Fire, that he might not run any hazard among Men. What can be said meaner, and more unworthy of the Divine Majesty?

[C] The Dominicans take a great deal of Pains to justify this Preacher.] To begin with the Sermon on the Pentecost, I observe, that Altamura is so far from owning, that there is any thing in it worthy of Censure, that, on the contrary, he finds it represents the Obstinacy of Mankind with wonderful Art, and is very much surprized at this rash Accusation of so eminent a Preacher. "Tanti nominis, says he (3), concionatore, tantocum fructu verbum Dei diffeminantem, ut adhuc vigeat ad perpetuum tantum viri decus commune in Italia proloquium. Nescitis prædicare, Qui negat Barlettæ (4). — So eminent and edifying a Preacher, that to his immortal Honour it continues a Proverb in Italy, to this Day, 'He who knows not how to imitate Barletta, knows not how to preach.' As for the main part of the other Objection, he answers it very poorly; for he pretends, that, according to Barletta, the Woman of Samaria knew by JESUS CHRIST's Garment, and his Hair, that he was a Jew; from whence, in arguing, he drew this Consequence, that he was circumcised. Once more, the shortest and best way is to say, that this poor Preacher did not know what he said with his third Mark: he had not known whereabouts he was, had he taken it for a Subject to reason upon.

[D] Some undertook to justify him, by denying, that he was the Author of the Sermons, which passed under his Name.] Leander Albertus pretends, that, in his Youth, he knew the ignorant Person, who forged those unworthy Productions, which went under the famous Name of Barletta (5). It is much to be wondered, that the new Author of the Bibliotheca of the Order, has not alleged this reason in justification of his Brother; some would be apt to say he durst not make use of it, because what Leander Albertus had said was known to be false. But, whether it be so or not, it is at least very certain, that there are some impertinent Things in the Writings, which are incontestably ascribed to Barletta. We have seen the Censure of Father Raynaud. Moreri is in the wrong to maintain, that several Protestant Authors have made use of his pretended Sermons, to ridicule the Catholics, and that, among those, Henry Stephens is one of the first: for I dare be positive, that the Sermons, from whence Henry Stephens took his Raileries, are none of those, which Leander Albertus imputes to an Impostor. The Dispute between the Father and the Holy Ghost is one of Henry Stephens's Gaieties; now Altamura acknowledges, that Barletta is the Author of it.

BARLEUS (MELCHIOR), a Native of Antwerp, a Latin Poet in the XVth Century, and Son of Lambert Barleus, who was Keeper of the Records of Antwerp, above Forty Years, was educated under good Masters, and testified by several Writings, both in Prose and in Verse [A], the Progress he had made. One of his Brothers, whose Name was James, left his Country for his Religion, and made his Escape into Holland, where, after having been Regent of the second Class, in the College of Leyden, he was called to the Brill, to be Rector of the College there. Gaspar Barleus, elder Brother of Melchior [B], succeeded in the Office of Keeper of the Records, which his Father had; but, when Antwerp was again brought under the Yoke of the Spanish Government, he left his Country, and retired into Holland. He carried his eldest Son along with him, who was yet in the Cradle (a), and of whom I shall speak in the following Article.

(a) Taken from Gaspar Barleus's Funeral Oration spoken at Amsterdam, by John Arn. Corvus, Jan. 18, 1648.

[A] He published several Writings, both in Prose and in Verse.] These are the Titles of them; Brabantias libri 5. & Antwerpæ Encomium. De Diis Gentium libri 5. in Elegiac Verses, at Antwerp in 1562 (1). De raptu Ganymedis libri tres (2), & Bucolica, at Antwerp 1572. A Speech De vite humane felicitate; cum adjuncto carmine, De Rerum humanarum infirmitudine, ad Gasparem fratrem, at Antwerp 1566 (3). Historia de Domus Austriacæ Eminentia (4).

[B] Gaspar Barleus was elder Brother of Melchior.] I make no doubt but Valerius Andreas has taken this Gaspar for him who was Professor at Amsterdam, and whose Latin Verses were so much cried up. If he has, he was grossly mistaken: That Professor was Melchior's Nephew, and not his Brother. If it be said, in order to excuse Valerius Andreas on this account, that he does not make the Mistake, which I have supposed, yet he would be in the wrong on another: for when an Author is described by his Relations, those ought never to be made use of, who are unknown either in the Commonwealth of Learning, or in the World; and consequently these words of Valerius Andreas, Melchior Barleus, Antwerpensis, Gasparis frater, would be impertinent, if they were meant of Melchior's Brother; because that Brother, though he taught at Bommel, is an unknown Person. Moreri has committed the same Fault with Valerius Andreas.

(a) By the Epistle Dedicatory of his Letters, it appears that he was born February the 12th, BARLEUS (GASPAR), Nephew of the foregoing, was Professor of Philosophy at Amsterdam, and one of the elegant Latin Poets of the XVIIth Century. He was born at Antwerp in the Year 1584 (a). His Father, who was a Protestant, fled into Holland, when the Duke of Parma had made himself Master of that City. He staid three Years in Leyden, after which he was called to Bommel, to be Rector of the College there. He enjoyed that place seven Years, and then died, having designed his Son Gaspar for the Ministry of the Holy Gospel. This Gaspar studied eight Years in the College of the Province of Holland at Leyden, and, being afterwards received into the Ministry, he served a Country Church near the Brill. Bertius, being advanced from the Office of Sub-Principal to the Principalship of that College, thought no Person so fit to succeed him as our Barleus. His Recommendation was successful; Barleus was made Sub-Principal, and, some time after, Professor of Logic, in the University of Leyden. He concerned himself so far in the Disputes of the Arminians, that he was removed from all his Offices, when the opposite Party had fully triumphed in the Synod of Dort, in the Year 1618. Barleus began, then, to study Physic, and, in two Years time, thought himself fit to commence Doctor. He took his Degree at Caën; but scarce ever practised at all. Some young Persons desired him to read Lectures to them in Philosophy, and polite Learning; and, as it was what he had been used to, he resumed this Employment, and regained a great Character for it, even in the University of Leyden. The Magistrates of Amsterdam, having erected a famous School in the Year 1631, offered him the Professorship of Philosophy. He accepted, and discharged it very honourably until his Death, which happened the fourteenth of January, 1648 (b). He was a Man of great Merit. There is extant a Volume of Speeches, which he pronounced on several Subjects, and which are not only commendable for the Style, but also for the Turn, and frequent Touches, of Wit. Poetry was his chief Talent: His Muse was very copious and lofty (c). There scarce happened any great Subject during his Life, on which he did not bestow some pompous Encomium, if he was not prevented by Reasons of State [A]. Cardinal Richelieu, and Chancellor Oxenstiern, were not forgot: much less did he pass by the Conquests and brave Exploits of Frederic Henry Prince of Orange. Queen Mary de Medicis, and the magnificent Reception the met with at Amsterdam (d), gave Barleus occasion to exercise his Eloquence. He published some very sharp Pieces of Controversy, against the Adversaries of Arminius [B].

(c) See the Eleges of Barleus in the Diatribe de Poet. p. 140.

(d) In 1637.

That

[A] There scarce happened any great Subject, during his Life, on which he did not bestow some pompous Encomium, if he was not prevented by Reasons of State.] I make use of this Restriction, because I have read in Barleus's Letters, that he refused to write a Poem on the Coronation of the Emperor Ferdinand III, which had been requested of him. He considered, that he had to do with suspicious Persons, who would not fail to stigmatize him as a Pensionary of the House of Austria; besides, after having so highly celebrated the Victories of Gustavus over the Emperor, he did not see how he could compliment Ferdinand, on any great Honour acquired in making War with the Swedes. Here is an honest Poet! How many of his Profession get over these Scruples! They have a two-handed Pen; they do not only prepare Panegyrics for the conquering Party, be it who it will, but also, after the Event, make Verses for both Parties (1). I do not question but that there are Poets in Italy, who have complimented, or will compliment, both the Dauphin, and Prince Lewis of Baden, on the Campaign of 1693. These are the Words of Barleus: "Litteras accepi Viennæ, quibus petitur uti laudatione aliqua velim prosequi Coronationem Ferdinandi tertii Imperatoris. Ego si sapiam abstinebo ab illa laudatione religiosissime. Quamquam enim ea possem scribere quæ ad laudes Imperatoris faciant, nec Reip. nostræ adversentur, tamen prout sunt nostratium ingenia, judicarent me beneficio obstrictum Austriacis. Scimus Cæsarem non quidem sperto Martem nos petere, sed per latum Hispani nobis gravem esse. Laudavi etiam non ita pridem Gustavum Suecicæ Regem, ejusque adversus Cæsarem bella probavi. Jam ut laudem Ferdinandum tertium ob gesta adversus Suecos feliciter bella, à prudentia mea impetrare non possum. Non sum ambider, fext, sed ab omni adulatione alienissimum. Cuperem obsequi petitioni illustriissimi Legati, sed hoc cavendum ne dum foris bene, domi male audiam. Forte nimis sum meticulosus, sed & illud certum illum Cæsaris laudationem à me protestam calumniam suspitionibusque opportunam fore (2). — I received Letters from Vienna, desiring I would compose something in Honour of the Coronation of the Emperor Ferdinand III. But I think it prudent to decline this Task entirely. For though I might pay a Compliment to the Emperor, without the least Prejudice to our Commonwealth, yet such are the Suspicions of our People, that they would believe me to be bribed by the House of Austria. We know the Emperor does not strike at us directly, but only by means of the Spaniard. Besides, I have congratulated Gustavus, King of Sweden, on his War with the Emperor. And I cannot think it consistent with my Reason, to compliment Ferdinand III, on the very same Occasion. I scorn to play a double Part, and have the greatest aversion to Flattery. I should be glad to obey the Request of the most illustrious Ambassador, but must take care that, while I am esteemed abroad, I am not ill thought of at home. Perhaps I am too scrupulous, but undoubtedly an Encomium on the Emperor, composed by me, would give room for Suspicions and Reflexions." Barleus's Fear was not without Foundation; and, if Reason would not suffer him to write the Panegyric of Ferdinand III, because Holland was at War with the House of Austria, and an Author should not blow hot and cold, Prudence no less advised him to forbear that Elogy. Those, who believed him a Friend to the Arminians, would have defamed him as an Enemy to God and the State, and would not have been content with declaring him such, both in private and in public. To conclude, if all the Heroes, he celebrated, paid him as well as Cardinal Richelieu (3), he had no reason to say, that the Culture of Parnassus is That of an ungrateful Soil.

[B] He published some very sharp Pieces of Controversy against the Adversaries of Arminius. In the Year 1615, he published a Piece at Leyden, entitled, Bogermannus talskyggenes, seu Examen Epistolæ dicatoriæ quam jussu ad pietatem illustrium Ordinum Hollandiæ & Westfrisiæ notis præfixit Joannes Bogermannus Ecclesiæ Leuwardensis: in quo etiam Crimina à Mattheo Slado imposita Erasmo Roterodamo diluuntur. The Year following he published a little Book, the Title whereof was, Dissertationcula in qua aliquot

That Wound was never healed: He was looked upon all his Life time, as a Favourer of that Sect [C], and many Persons murmured against the Magistrates of Amsterdam, for entertaining such a Professor. All his Proceedings were narrowly watched, and not the least Favour shewn him. He was terribly exclaimed against, for some Verses he had made on the Book of a Rabbi [D]. After his Death, his Letters were published in Two Volumes (e); but the Sextus Empiricus, aliquot Patricæ Theologorum & Ecclesiastiarum malejana consilia & studia iusta orationis libertate reprehenduntur. There was too much tartness in that piece, and it was too severe on the Preachers; for he pretends (4), that Holland afforded, "Viros Prædicatorum rii ordinis vocales plus satis, qui ad scribendos salutarios libros inepti, ad prædicandum Christi sapientiam elingues, tamen ad obtestandum cum Magistratibus, tum dissentientibus circa res religionis symmilitis, disertis sint & copiosi. — Preachers louder than they need to be, who have neither Pen to compose good Books, nor Tongue to deliver the Doctrines of Christianity, but can find both in the most full and eloquent manner to defame not only Magistrates, but also their own Fraternity, who differ from them in matters of Religion." In the following Page he says, "Si templa aliquot Hollandiæ peragraré libeat, Theologos quamplurimos in spermologos, concionatores in convitatores, pacis præcones in factionum principes & schismatis faciundi buccinatores transformatos mirabere, nec tam reformatæ amplius, quam pessimis aliorum moribus deformatæ religionis antilites esse jurabis. — If you look into some of the Churches of Holland, you will be surprised to find several Divines transformed into idle Praters; Preachers into Slanderers; and the Messengers of Peace into Ringleaders and Trumpeters of Faction and Schism: infamous that you would be apt to regard them as Priests of a Religion, not reformed, but deformed by the baseness of their own Morals." This is a most violent Insult on those, whose Character ought to have obliged him to treat them with Respect. This Invektive was immediately translated into Dutch. I cannot well tell whether it was in this Dissertation, that he called one Vincent Drielenburgh, who had set up for a Prophet, by the Name of Nebulo; but either in this, or some other Writing, he made use of that opprobrious Expression; which exasperated that Person to such a Degree, that he published a Book, wherein he calls Barleus a Knave and a Rascal, Nebulonem & Sceleratum, and engaged to give an Hundred Livres to the Deaconry of Leyden, and to deliver himself up into the Hands of Justice, that his Punishment might be exemplary, if it could be proved, by solid Reasons, that he was a Knave, Nebulo. Vincentius etiam Drielenburgh suis prophetandi partibus non desuit, nam anno superiore à Galparo Barleus in scripto quodam Nebulonis nomine designatus, id adeo Propetice suæ dignitati patavit esse injuriosum, ut edito mox scripto eundem Barleum sceleratum & Nebulonem nominaret, &c. (5). A little while after, there came out a Book, which pretended to prove this Charge against Drielenburgh, by ten incontestable Reasons. He answered those ten Reasons, and flew out extremely against Barleus. The latter composed a Remonstrance to the States-General during his Exile. It is dated from Francfort, in the Month of August, 1620, and intitled, Fides imbellis, sive Epistola parænetica ad illuissimos & potentissimos Fœderatarum Provinciarum Ordines. It is a Piece very well written, wherein the sad Consequences of Persecution, and the Rights of Conscience, are very pathetically represented. You will find it in the Præstantium & Eruditorum Virorum Epistolæ (6).

[C] He was looked upon, all his Life-time, as a Favourer of the Arminian Sect. It is certain, that, after he was restored in the University of Leyden, he did not break off his Correspondence with the Arminians. His Hundred and fifty sixth Letter informs Uytendogard, that Polyander, Professor of Divinity at Leyden, had discovered to his Friends, that all the Moderation, which appeared in the Writings, published by the Faculty of Theology, against the Arminians, came from himself: Quidquid mollius leniusque scriptum reperitur in specimine, à se protulisse esse, reliqua asperiora collegarum esse (7); but that he desired the Arminians, who were made acquainted with it, would keep it secret, because it would expose him to the Indignation of his Colleagues. Regavit me obnixè per D. Vossium intermunicum, vobis uti scriberem, ne si forte hac

res ad aures vestras pervenerit, ejus in responso vestro meminisse velitis, ne collegarum suorum invidiæ ac odiis, quorum jam semina jacta, miser obiciatur (8). The following Letter testifies, that one of Polyander's Colleagues reproached him for having told this to Barleus, an Enemy of the Church: Tu hoc dixisti Barleus, quem scis esse hostem Ecclesiæ, qui illud ipsum ad Uytendogardum, & Episcopum perscripturus est. These Letters were written in the Year 1630. It appears, by Barleus's Letters, that he was always of the Opinion of the Remonstrants.

[D] He was exclaimed against, for some Verses he had made on the Book of a Rabbi. Menasseh Ben-Israel, one of the most learned Men among the Jews, in the XVIIth Century, published a Book on the Creation, in the Year 1634. Barleus made an Epigram upon it, and, according to Custom, suffered it to appear at the Head of the Work. He declared too plainly, that he preferred a good Life before the Truth of speculative Doctrines. A Divine of Deventer, made a mighty bustle about it; he published a Piece, wherein he maintained, that the Epigram was full of Blasphemies, and that the Author of it was a Socinian. Nay, there was a Design to bring the Matter before the States of Holland, to convict Barleus, and all the Arminians, of Socinianism. Consilia agitari uti Libellus iste Conscriptis ordinibus Hollandiæ exhibetur ut appareat Barleum & Remonstrantes esse Socinianos (9). Barleus defended himself with Heat, and was very angry. He maintained, that his Words were maliciously interpreted, and even falsified, that they might the better colour the Arts they made use of, to find such a Meaning as he had never thought of. "Epigramma quoddam meum — quæsitis & perversis detorsionibus malignè interpretatur. Dicit illo epigrammate contineri varia quæ Ecclesiæ perniciofa, religioni Christianæ probrofa, & in Deum ac Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum impia sunt. Socinianismum adhuc auctori epigrammatis impingit, &c. — Censor pessima fide voculam è carmine sustulit, & suam substituit, maneamus pro vivamus. Sensus affingit verbis meis de quibus ne per somnium quidem cogitavi (10). — He maliciously interprets a certain Epigram of mine — by far-etched and unfair Constructions. He says, that Epigram contains several Things destructive to the Church, opprobrious to Christianity, and blasphemous to God, and our Lord Jesus Christ. He also charges the Author of it with Socinianism, &c. — This Censor has unjustly suppressed an Expression of mine, and substituted one of his own, maneamus, instead of vivamus. He construes my Verses in such a Sense, as 'I never once dreamed of.' He protested that he was no Socinian, that he never had been one, and that he detested the Doctrines of the Socinians. He added, that some would be glad to have him a Socinian, that their Hatred of him might find a larger Field of Triumph. Non sum Socinianus nec fui unquam, imo hostis sum istorum dogmatum acerrimus. Vellent quidam me esse qui explendi in me odi materiam sollicitè querunt (11). If that Judgment were false, it was, however, not unlikely; for those who engage in Controversies about Doctrines, accuse their Adversaries of so many things, that, commonly speaking, nothing can mortify them more, than to appear quite different from their Representations. However it be, it was lawful for Barleus to repulse the Calumny; but he ought not to have made such stinging Verses against the Divine of Deventer, that perhaps Archibolus would not have exceeded them. That Divine's Name, in short, was Vedelius, and his Book entituled Deus Synagoga. A Professor of Utrecht (12) seconded him in that Attack, by a Piece called Vorsius redivivus, which Vedelius took care to get printed. Vorsius believed, that Barleus felt sick, by laying the Insults of those two Antagonists too much to Heart. See what he wrote to Grotius the fifteenth of December, 1637. "Collega Barleus jam tertium menssem laborat quartanâ. Metuitur ei à magistro. Ut Empiricus, which was expected from him, never appeared. He has shewn how able he was to write History, by the Relation of what passed in Brasil, during the Government of Count Maurice of Nassau. He published that History in the Year 1647. Strange Reports were raised about his last Sickness [E], and about his Death [F]; but the Truth of it is hardly to be known: There is but little Credit to be given to Reports of this Nature; for it is notorious, from an hundred Examples, that, if an Author has distinguished himself ever so little, Fame does very much magnify the Personal or Domestic Disgraces, which befall him: And those, who are acquainted with the whole Secret, are commonly Persons too nearly concerned to publish what may occasion the least Disreputation.

 " Colleague, Barleus, has been afflicted with a Quar-tan these three Months. He is in some Danger of " a Consumption. If he recovers, he will scarce ever " be the same Man again. He destroyed his Health,
 " by applying so closely to the Work, which is now
 " printing. The Subject is the Entry of the Queen-
 " Mother into our City, and her magnificent Recepti" on. It will appear in a very fine Letter, and a" dorned with several Copper-Plates. He owns, among " his Friends, the Account I have now given. But I " much fear, that his Distemper is rather owing to his " laying too much to Heart the Calumnies published " against him by Dr Vedelius, and Mr Schoockius." I believe, that most of Barleus's best Friends found him too much concerned for the Censure of his Epigram; for they advised him to despise his Critics, whom they lashed severely. " Tibi sum auctor ut

 " does not load Manasses the Jew with Reproaches,
 " the whole Order of Divines are angry, and bespatter

 " nets. For a Repulse only makes them return to the " Charge with greater Fury, and, if you shake off their " Vengeance, as though you were the Aggressor." Barleus's Epigram, which was the Cause of so much Stir, would have found a place here, if it had not lately been inserted in a little Book, which is in every body's Hands (17). I am surprized to find in it but a very small part of Barleus's Verses against Vedelius; but I wonder yet more, how Sorbieri could think, that the Passage, which he mentions, shews the Author scoffed at both Religions. These are Sorbieri's Words: " Cùm

 " Vedelius nomen suum in priori scripto analytico
 " epigrammatis Barleani restituisset (18) ait
 " ----- quid tenebroso
 Calumniator prave delites antro,
 Et excolet sæve tergiversator

Portenta fidei, exhibilata Senenſis Commenta verbis affricas ferenatis?

" Quæ sane nec Calvinianis satisfacere nec aliis, sed
 " utriusque religionis ludibrio habitæ poetam merito
 " suspectum reddidere (19). ----- Because Vedelius (19) Sorbe-
 " bad suppressed his Name in his first Piece, against
 " Barleus's Epigram, he makes him this Reply,

Why starts the Slanderer, in his darksome Den,
 The bellish Maxims of the worst of Men?
 Why brings he back that cursed Sect to light,
 Long since condemn'd to everlasting Night?

" which can neither be agreeable to the Calvinists,
 " nor the others, but justly renders the Poet suspected " of ridiculing both Religions." A Man must be mad or drunk to judge so; for the Verses, which we have just now read, are the most severe that can be made against Socinianism, and no Body can testify more earnestly, than Barleus has done, how much he detested to be suspected of that Heresy. This Author's Prose, which Sorbieri has quoted a little before, thunders full as violently against that Sect.

[E.] Strange Reports were raised about his last Sickness. I have heard say, that he thought himself to be made of Glass, and that he was afraid of being broke to pieces, when any body came near him.
 Others have told me, that he fancied himself Butter, or Straw, and durst not come near the Fire. This is inconsistent with his Funeral Oration, spoken by Cor-vinus, Professor of Law; for it is there affirmed, that he read a Lecture to his Scholars the Day before he died, and that he was going to read another, when a Faintness seized him, from which he never recovered. Id quod dolemus, eo accidisse momento quo se parabat ut juventuti sibi commissæ docendo debitum præstaret officium (20). " Antecessit quidem eum
 " morbus cum quo luctabatur subinde, non tamen
 " tantus quin aliquomodo confectus adhuc sufficeret
 " laboribus. Audiverant eum, pridie diei quo eum
 " mors invasit, discipuli docentem: audivissent eam-
 " dem qua occidit, nisi ipsis eum abfultisset, ita ut

 " Indisposition, which now and then afflicted him,
 " but not so severely as to binder him from going on " with his usual Employments. His Pupils had been " at Lectures with him the Day before he died, and " were to have gone again the next, if a sudden " Fainting, as I have been informed, which, by fre" quent Instances, was become almost epidemical, had " not carried him off." It is very remarkable, that he had a little before made use of the same Precaution: " Inopinatus eum extinxit, ut nobis rela" tum, Lipothymia. Inde factum ut eum extin" ctum ante audiverimus, quàm morti esse propin-
 " quum morbus prænuntiaret. ----- A sudden Faint" ness, as I have been told, carried him off. So that " we heard of his Death, before any Dissemper had " discovered him to be in Danger." Observe, that Corvinus had just before addressed his Speech to the Disciples of the deceased. And can any one think he would have told them falsely to their Face, that they assisted at one of his Lectures, the Day before his Death?

[F.] And about his Death. Morbosus reports, that Barleus died in a Well, and that it is not known, whether he fell into it accidentally, or threw himself into it. Misero fato periiit, puteo submersus, an sponte, an casu, incertum, de morte ejus jam supra diximus.
 It is thus he speaks, in the Three hundredth Page of his Polybistor. Doubtless he refers us to Page 155, 8 C when

when he says, that he had already mentioned This Death: But, in the One hundred fifty fifth Page, he does not acribe it either to an Accident, or to a premeditated Design, but affirms, that Barleus became mad, and cast himself into a Well; and quotes the Sixty fourth Letter of Sorbiere. "Eo nonnullorum excrevit à fiducia nimia ambitio, ut finis aliorum judicio in extremam incidant infamiam. Quod Barleus accidit, qui ob prælatum sibi Spanhemium in maniam incidit, seque ipsum in puteo suffocavit, quod de eo Sorbiere refert Epist. 64. extatque apud Duportum Musarum subcisiya-rum, Lib. 1. de eo Epigramma (21). — To such an Extrem are some Persons hurried by Pride and Self-conceit, that a Disappointment from the Judgment of others shall throw them into Madness. This happened to Barleus, who, on account of the Preference being given to Spanheim, fell into a Distraction, and drowned himself in a Well; This is related by Sorbiere, Epist. 64. lib. 1. And there is an Epigram upon it in Duport's Muse Subcisiya, lib. 1." This Quotation is very false, for here is what Sorbiere says. "The Death of Barleus, of which you desire the Particulars, is not of that Importance (22), though he was a very worthy Man; for there will always be found a greater Number of excellent Poets than Physicians. When I was at Amsterdam, they spoke variously of his Death, as if Melancholy had hastened it. It is true, that, having composed a Funeral Oration, in Verse, on the Death of the Prince of Orange, and Dr Spanheim having spoke one in Prose, he bore the Inequality of their Reward very impatiently: For, as Salmafius said, very pleasantly, they made a great Mistake, in giving the Trooper's Pay to the Foot Soldier, and That of the Foot Soldier to the Trooper. Barleus had but Five hundred Livres, and the other had Five hundred Crowns." There is nothing about Barleus's Death in the Sarberiana. We find there, indeed, that, according to the common Report, Barleus was subject to some Fits of Lunacy: "Ferebatur intervalla quædam minus lucida habere, nec aberat conjectura oculorum qui non bene sanam cerebri particulam indicabant. — He was said to have Intervals of P frenzy, and that a Wildness about the Eyes discovered his Brain was not right."

(22) That is, of the same Importance with that of Wal-leus and Visslingius, who did not meet the same just before.

BARLEUS (LAMBERT), Brother of the foregoing, was born at Bommel in Guelderland, in the Year 1595 (a). He was Greek Professor in the University of Leyden. Before That, he had been Teacher of the Second Class in a College at Amsterdam [A], and, before he taught that Class, he had been Minister of the Baron de Langerac, the Dutch Ambassador in France (b). He was called to Leyden to fill up the place of Jeremias Hoelzelin, and a new Addition was made to that Office; for it was given him with the Title of Professor in Ordinary (c), which is attended with several Advantages. He made his Inauguration Speech, De Græcarum Literarum Præstantia ac Utilitate, the Twenty second of October, 1641. In 1652, he published the Timon of Lucian, with several Notes, which have nothing very extraordinary, or profound, in them, but may be useful to Youth. He died the sixteenth of June, 1655 (d). His Commentary on the Theogony of Hesiod was printed in 1658.

[A] He had been Teacher, of the second Class, in a College, at Amsterdam.] The Dutch give the Title of Corrector to the Teacher of this Class. That is to say, The Rector's Assistant. They call the Teacher of the first Class Rector. He has an Inspection over the other Teachers.

BARLOW (THOMAS), Bishop of Lincoln, in the Reign of Charles II, was a very learned Man. He was a long time Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford, and it has been suspected by a certain Person, that he was removed from thence for being too Orthodox [A]. He was very zealous against Popery, as he demonstrated by his Writings [B]. He had a large Collection of Books, and was a Man of great Reading. He died in the Year 1690, or thereabouts. Some small Pieces, which were found among his Papers, have been published since his Death. He has been confounded with William Barlow [C], Bishop of Lincoln, who flourished under King James I, and also died under that Prince.

[A] It has been suspected, by a certain Person, that he was removed from the University of Oxford for being too Orthodox.] This certain Person is a famous Minister, and Professor of Divinity, at Groningen; in a Word, it is James Alting. He says, in a Letter dated the thirteenth of March, 1676, That Dr Barlow was lately advanced to the Bishopric of Lincoln, on purpose that he might be removed from the University, where he taught the Orthodox Faith (1); for, adds he, the English are much inclined to Pelagianism and Socinianism: And, on this Occasion, he mentions a Book, De Unione & Communionem cum Christo, the Author of which is named Sberlock.

[B] He was very zealous against Popery, as he demonstrated by his Writings.] When there was so much Discourse about Titus Oates, and the horrible Conspiracy, which he discovered, This Bishop published a Book, wherein he maintained, against all Evolutions, that it is an Article of the Roman Faith, that the Pope may depose Sovereigns, and give their Dominions to others. This was a very good way to shew, that he designed to do the Papists some Prejudice; for, of all the Means likely to stir up the Zeal of the Nation against them, there is none can do it more effectually, than to shew, that they are always ready, from a Principle of Conscience, to take up Arms against Protestant Princes. The Book, which Barlow published on That Subject, was immediately translated into French, and published under this Title: An Historical Treatise on the Subject of Excommunicating and Deposing of Kings: at Paris, by Claude Barbin, 1681 (2).

[C] He has been confounded with William Barlow.] The two Authors, who have added some Supplements to the Treatise of John Deekberrus, De Scriptis Adelpotis, are fallen into this Error. Deekberrus had said, that the Jesuit, who wrote, in English, against King James, concerning the Apology for the Oath of Allegiance, was refuted by Mr Baclo, Bishop of Lincoln. One of his Friends (3) informed him, by Letter, that This Prelate's Name was not Baclo, but Thomas Barlow; "Is si placet est Thomas Barlowius magni apud Anglos nominis, & de nominibus optime meritis. Optandum foret videre aliquando aversos ipsius, quorum magnam in instructissima sua Bibliotheca copiam habet, & nuperime uno & altero opusculo præfatum contra Curiam Romanam magnum litteratis desiderium excitavit. Historia ejus de conspiratione contra Ja-colum Angliæ Regem, vulgo The Gun-powder Treason, non ita pridem publicum vidit. — His Name is Thomas Barlow, who is very famous in his own Nation, and deserves very well of ours. It were to be wished he would present the World with his Manuscript Pieces, which are very numerous, and, by a late Taste or two of which, chiefly against

"against the Court of Rome, he has greatly excited the Curiosity of the Learned. His History of the Conspiracy against James King of England, commonly called The Gun powder Plot, has been lately published." The Letter, from which I have taken these Words, was written, at Strasburg, in 1681. It is plain therefore, that Mr Deckberrus's Friend imagined, that the Bishop of Lincoln, who had wrote, for King James, against a Jesuit, was yet living. Now this is a great Mistake. It was in the Year 1609, that King James made use of the Pen of Dr Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln, against Robert Parsons, an English Jesuit. If that Doctor had been yet living, in the Year 1681, his Age must have been a Circumstance very extraordinary, and those would have been inexcusable, who should have mentioned his Learning, and his Books, without taking notice of his great Age. It will be to no purpose to use any Evasions, or urge, that some learned Men live an hundred Years; since it is very well known, that the Name of the Bishop of Lincoln, who wrote for King James, was William, and not Thomas. I do not know whether an hundred Years would have been sufficient for Thomas Barlow to be living in 1681, and to have been a Bishop in the Year 1609; for it is very rare to be a Bishop, in England, before the Age of Thirty five or forty Years. The Author of the Nouvelles de la Republique de Lettres, who took a small Review of Mr Deckberrus's, and Mr Vindingius's Faults, did not only overlook this, but, which is worse, adopted it (4).

BARNES (ROBERT) (a), Professor of Divinity, and Chaplain to Henry VIII [A], King of England, was sent, by his Master, into Germany, in the Year 1535 [B]. He conferred forthwith with the Protestant Divines, on the Subject of the Divorce: He had afterwards some Audiences of the Elector of Saxony, and joined with the English Embassadors, who proposed to that Elector an Alliance against the Pope, and who desired, that Henry VIII might be associated in the League of Smalcald. They gave hopes of a Reformation in England; but, at the bottom, their only aim was to obtain an approbation of their Master's Divorce, and a Politic Alliance to give the Emperour more Trouble, who threatened to revenge the Injury done to his divorced Aunt. They carried back an Opinion of the Divines of Wittemberg, which was not altogether favourable for them [C]; but they suppressed the Conclusion, when they presented it to the King. That part which

(a) See Romanek [A].

[A] He was Professor of Divinity, and Chaplain to King Henry VIII.] He was mentioned by these Titles, in the Credential Letters, which the King, his Master, gave him, in order to his Negotiation in Saxony; and those Letters are dated from Windsor, the eighth of July, 1535 (1). His Christian Name does not appear, in those Letters, before That of Barnes. In Germany he gave himself the Name of Antony Amarius, though his true Name was Robert Barnes. When he dedicated his Lives of the Popes to the King of England, in the Year 1535, he signed R. Barnes, Doctor (2). It appears, in a Preface of Luther (3), that Barnes concealed his Name, and his Title of Doctor, in Wittemberg, for fear of the Persecutors. Melancthon calls him D. Antonius Doctor, or D. Antonius, in a Letter, which he wrote to the King of England, the thirteenth of March, 1535 (4).

[B] He was sent, by his Master, into Germany, in the Year 1535.] The Preface, which I have quoted, informs me, that Barnes resided at Wittemberg, about the Year 1530, and that he did even lodge in the House of Luther. "Quis ante annos decem hoc decus in Beneficio quævisisset, & quod Christus ipse in eo nobiscum versatus esset? domesticum enim & commensalem habuimus (5). — Who, ten Years ago, would have expected this Honour from Barnes, and, that Christ himself, in him, should make his Abode with me? For he hath lodged and boarded with me." Barnes might have lived in Germany till the Year 1535, and might have received Credential Letters there, from Henry VIII, to negotiate with the Elector of Saxony. Upon This Supposition, the Author of the History of the Reformation of England might very well say, "That, at last, while the Bishop of Hereford was at Smalcald, that is, in the Year 1536, Barnes was sent, by That Minister, into England, where he was very well received by Henry, and entertained by Cromwell (6)." I say, upon This Supposition, this Account would be exact; for all that Mr de Seckendorf alleges against it, is, that Barnes came from England into Germany, in the Year 1535, with a Commission from Henry VIII (7). He was therefore returned into England, before the Bishop of Hereford sent him thither, and therefore the Message he was sent on, by That Prelate, ought not to be taken for his Return Home. But can it be proved, that the Credential Letters were not sent to Barnes into Germany, and that he himself was sent into That Country? Yes, it may: Seckendorf proves it from the Records, which have furnished him with many good Pieces: "Venerat Wittembergam (Reg. x. fol. 99. n. 42.) verno hujus anni 1535 tempore, Doctor ex Britannia ab Henrico Rege missus (8). —

"There came, to Wittemberg, in the Spring of the Year 1535, a Doctor from England, sent by Henry VIII." Melancthon confirms the same thing in Greek; for he made use of That Language to inform his good Friend Camerarius, that there was an Envoy from England, who spoke of nothing but of the King's second Marriage, and who said, that Henry VIII cared but little for the Affairs of Religion.

Ἡσέ δὲ πρὸς ἡμᾶς ἔξω τῆς περιουσίας ἐκ τῆς Βρετανίας, μόνον διαλεχόμενος περὶ τῆς ἐνέληρα γάμου τῶ βασιλεῶς, τὸν δὲ τῆς ἐκκλησίας περὶ μᾶλλον ἢ μίλει, ὡς φησι, τῶ βασιλεῖ (9). But, though we are not allowed to make the Supposition before mentioned, yet we may nevertheless hold Dr Burnet's Account to be true. That Historian says only, that the Bishop of Hereford sent Barnes into England: he does not deny, that Barnes was returned thither before.

[C] He, and his Colleagues - - - carried back an Opinion of the Divines of Wittemberg, which was not favourable for them.] Dr Burnet gives the Particulars of it very exactly; "Their first Sentiment of this Matter, says he (10), was, that the Ordinances of the Levitical Law were not moral. - - - Afterwards they altered their Opinion, when the Question had been a little more agitated; but they never agreed, that a Marriage, already consummated, could be dissolved, and they confirmed themselves more and more in this last Opinion, so that they condemned the King's two Marriages." He mentions this under the Year 1530. Not that he was ignorant, that This Opinion was given in 1536; but he did it, without doubt, to shew his Reader, all at once, the different Opinions of the Divines on the Divorce of Henry VIII. Mr Seckendorf thought so: for when he remarks, that the Opinion of the Divines of Wittemberg is to be found in the History of the Reformation of the Church of England, in the Collection of Records, and Original Papers, among those belonging to the Year 1530, he adds this Parenthesis (forte per occasionem). "Annus & dies responso huic non est adscriptus, & Burnetus illud inter acta anni 1530 (forte per occasionem) retulit. Lib. II. fol. 94 (11). - - - This Opinion is without Date, and Burnet has related it (perhaps occasionally) among the Transactions of the Year 1530. Book II. pag. 94." The Bishop of Meaux did not know, that the Decree of Wittemberg was of the Year 1536. He speaks only of Melancthon's Opinion, as to That Year, and does not criticize Dr Burnet, for having placed the Answer of the Divines of Wittemberg, in the Year 1530 (12). Mr Seckendorf observes, that the Copy of That Answer, which he read in the Archives of Weimar, which must have been disagreeable to that Prince, was in the Conclusion (b). The Conduct of Barnes pleased the King of England very well; for which reason he was employed to cultivate a Correspondence with the Princes of Germany. He was sent several times to those Courts; and, among other Negotiations, he was the first who was employed in the Treaty of Marriage with Anne of Cleves [D]. He was a good Lutheran, and made no Secret of it in his Sermons; for, in the Lent Season of the Year 1540, he confuted the Sermon, which Bishop Gardiner had preached against the Doctrine of Luther. He took Gardiner's own Text, and taught a quite contrary Doctrine to what that Prelate had established concerning Justification: he even attacked that Bishop personally, after an indecent manner, and jested on the Name of Gardiner. Gardiner's Friends complained to the King about it, who ordered, that Barnes should give him Satisfaction for it; that he should sign certain Articles, and make a Recantation in the Pulpit. All this was performed, but in such a manner, that Complaints were made, that in one part of his Sermon he had the Subtlety to maintain what he had retracted in the other. Upon these Complaints the King ordered him to be sent to the Tower, from whence he never returned but to suffer Death in the midst of Flames [E]; for the Parliament condemned him as an Heretic, without giving him leave to make his Defence. A little before his Death, he declared his Belief, rejected Justification by Works, the Invocation of Saints, &c. and desired that the King would go about a good Reformation (c). The freedom of his Tongue had brought him into many Troubles a long time before. In Wolsey's Prosperity, he preached so strongly at Cambridge against the Luxury of the Prelates, that every body might easily guess he designed it against that Cardinal. This occasioned his being sent for to London, where he came off - - - by the Solicitations of Gardiner and Fox, by means of abjuring some Articles proposed to him. "Afterwards he was imprisoned again on new Accusations, and then every one believed he would be burnt. But he made his Escape, and retired into Ger-is longer than That, which is to be found among Dr Burnet's Original Pieces. Here is the Passage, which was suppressed by the Embassadors of Henry VIII. "Eti contentiamus cum Dominis legatis servandum esse legem de uxore fratris non ducenda, mansit tamen inter nos controversum quod legati statuunt dispensationi locum non esse, nos vero putamus esse illi locum. Neque enim strictius obligare nos lex potest quam Judæos: si autem lex dispensationem admittit, vinculum matrimonii utique fortius est quam lex illa altera de uxore fratris. — Although we agree with their Excellencies the Embassadors, that the Law, which prohibits the marrying a Brother's Wife, is to be observed, yet we differ in this, that they hold this Law cannot be dispensed with, and we think it may. For we cannot be under a stricter Obligation to the Law, than the Jews were: and, if the Law admits of a Dispensation, the Tie of Matrimony is more binding than that other Law concerning the Brother's Wife." Mr Seckendorf conjectures, that the Embassadors suppressed That Passage, that their Master might still entertain Hopes, that the Divines of Wittemberg would at last approve his second Marriage.

This Thought is very reasonable: and, in general, those Divines might very justly suppose, that there are Acts, which ought not to have been executed, and which yet, being once executed, ought to be maintained. But, I confess, I cannot well apprehend how the beginning and end of their Opinion can be reconciled. They own, on the one side, that the Ordinances of the Levitical Law are Divine, Natural, and Moral; that no Law can be made in Opposition to them; and, that the Church has always judged, that a Man's Marriage with his Brother's Widow is incestuous. "Hoc manifestum est, & negare nemo potest, quod lex tradita Levit. xviii. 20. prohibet ducere fratris uxorem, &c. fed divina, naturalis, & moralis lex est intelligenda tam de vivi quam de mortui fratris uxore, & quod contra hanc legem nulla contraria lex fieri aut constitui possit (13):" and, on the other side, they maintain, that This Levitical Law may be dispensed with: Legati statuunt dispensationi locum non esse, nos vero putamus esse illi locum. If it may be dispensed with, Henry VIII ought to have believed, that he was lawfully married to Catherine of Aragon. But, if it is Indispensable, Divine, Natural, and Moral, and such, in a Word, as will admit of no contrary Authority; lastly, if the Church has always adjudged, that a Marriage, not conformable to This Law, is incestuous, then Henry VIII ought to have looked upon his Cohabitation with Catherine of Aragon as no other than Incest, and therefore immediately he ought to have obtained from it, and the Divines of Wittemberg ought to have made no Doubt, whether they should approve, or disapprove, his Divorce. The Maxim, That there are things, which ought not to have been done, which, when once they are done, ought not to be undone, could have no place here, since the Question was about the Continuation of an Incest. Those, who love Scandal, and want an Opportunity to recriminate, would not easily agree with the Observation of Dr Burnet, "That if, in the Conduct of the Saxon Divines, there does not appear the Cunning, the Policy, and the Diffimulation, of the Court of Rome, yet there appears in it, at least, the Candour, the Sincerity, and good Conscience, of the Apostolic Times (14)." For my own Part, I had rather suppose, that they did not reason consistently, than that they designed to have the Pleasure of reflecting on the Pope's Dispensation, and at the same time the Policy of carrying it fair to Charles V, and the Interests of his Cousin the Princess Mary: but an Adversary, who loves to give things a malicious Turn, might, by way of Repraisal, pass a severe Judgment on the Conduct of those Divines (15).

[D] He was employed in the Treaty of the Marriage with Anne of Cleves.] This was a Misfortune to Barnes; "Because the King being not well pleased with that Marriage, spared neither the Author nor the Instruments of it." This is what the Bishop of Salisbury assures us (16). Luther has touched on another Circumstance; he says, That the true Cause of the King's hatred for Robert Barnes, was the Liberty, wherewith that Doctor diffused him from repudiating Anne of Cleves (17). Mr Seckendorf pretends, that Dr Burnet observes the same thing (18): I question it much; for I have not met with it in his Reformation of England.

[E] He was sent to the Tower, from whence he never returned, but to suffer Death in the midst of Flames.] The Relation of his Martyrdom was sent from England into Germany. Mr Seckendorf found it in the Archives of Weimar, translated into the German Language (19). Luther published it (20), and added a Preface to it, wherein, among other things, he praises Barnes's Modesty. "He was not ignorant, says he, of the Failings of Henry VIII, nor did he dissemble them among his Friends; but every where else he spoke of that Prince in very respectful and honourable terms (21)."

"many, where he applied himself wholly" to the Study of the Bible, and of Divinity. He made so great a progress in it, that he became very considerable both among their Doctors, and Princes. When the King of Denmark sent Embassadors into England, he ordered, that Barnes should accompany them (d), or rather that he should be one of them (e). The Bishop of Salisbury, whom I quote in the Margin, might easily be justified in a Point, for which he is criticized (f). There are at least two Books published by Barnes [F].

[F] There are at least two Books published by Barnes.] The one contains the Articles of his Belief; the other is the History of the Popes. The first was printed in Latin with a Preface of Pomeranus, at whose House Barnes lodged at that time. It was printed in the German Language, at Nuremberg, in the Year 1531. It contains nineteen Theses according to Luther's Principles, and several Proofs taken from the Scripture, and the Fathers. The other Book was printed at Wittenberg in the Year 1536, with a Preface of Luther: It contains the Lives of the Popes from St Peter to Alexander III, and is dedicated to the King of England: The Author wrote the Epistle Dedicatory the tenth of September 1535. He treats the Popes very ill; and promises to continue their History down to his own Time (22). Mr Seckendorf is of opinion, that this Book deserves a second Edition (23), and has inserted the Preface of it in his Indexes, because, says he, it is very difficult to be met with, and may be reckoned for lost. Quia Liber ipse rarissime invenitur, & pro deperdito haberi potest (24). It is certain, however, that a new Edition of it was published at Leyden in the Year 1615, which contains also the Lives of the Popes, written by John Bale, and which is not yet very scarce.

BARNES (JOHN), in Latin Barneſius, an English Benedictin Monk, was one of those Roman Catholics, who, following the Examples of Erasmus, Cassander, Wicelius, Modrevius, Father Paul, and many others, made all their life-time Profession of the Catholic Religion, though they observed a great many abuses in it, which they heartily wished to see reformed. He wrote a Book against Mental Reservations, which was not at all pleasing to the Jesuits [A], though he dedicated it to Pope Urban VIII. His Catholico-Romanus pacificus is full of such things as cannot be relished by those, who are called good Papists [B]. Doubtless he desired to bring the two Churches as near one another as ever he could. The Court of Rome was very much displeased with him for it. This poor Man, of unexceptionable Morals (a), being at Paris, was apprehended [C], and stript of the Habit of his Order, to be carried into Flanders bound on Horseback. He was afterwards sent to Rome, where he remained in the Prison of the Inquisition, till he was removed into That of Lunatics (b). In this latter Station he ended his Days, being most certainly worthy of a better fate. He was a professed Monk of the Convent of the Benedictins of Douay, and had been Superior there (c); but, being not able to agree with the Monks of his Order, he retired into France, and did not obey the Summons of the Benedictins, requiring

[A] He wrote a Book against Mental Reservations, which was not at all pleasing to the Jesuits. It was printed at Paris in the Year 1625, under the Title of Dissertatio contra Æquivocationes: it was printed in French the same Year, and in the same place, under the Title of, Traité & Dispute contre les Équivoques. The Approbation of the Faculty of Divinity says, that John Barnes was Doctor of Arts, of Sacred Theology, and Professor of the English Mission, and first Assistant for the Congregation of Spain, and is dated the thirteenth of July 1624. The Author's Epistle Dedicatory is dated from Paris the thirteenth of January 1625. So that Father Theophilus Reynaud is mistaken, when he says, that Barnes was carried to Rome, and imprisoned under the Pontificate of Paul V. I shall relate his own Words; as they inform us of something concerning This poor Benedictin. "Joannes Barneſius Jesuitis admodum infensus, ob nonnullas suspiciones de competat illis vitæ suæ, eo loco fuit apud Paulum V, ut eum tanquam novæ fidei fabrum per Albertum Austriacum, & Gallia abducentem, & Belgio Romanum ævedum judicaretur carcere dignum: donec emotus cerebro inter fatuos pone S. Pauli minoris ædem sacram fatuari desit cum aliorum periculo (1). — John Barnes, a great Enemy to the Jesuits, from some Suspitions he had of their having discovered his Manner of Life, was seized in France as a Heretic, by Albert of Austria, and carried through Flanders to Rome, where he was condemned by Paul V, to be imprisoned; till, becoming distracted, he was removed to the Hospital of Lunatics behind the Church of St Paul the Minor, where he ceased to do mischief by his Madness." This Passage was quoted by Edward Brown, in the Eight hundred twenty sixth Page of his Appendix to the Fasciculus rerum expetendarum, printed at London 1690. See the following Remark. We read in the French Mercury (2), That this honest Benedictin believed, that the Jesuits hated him mortally, after the Printing of his Book of Equivocations; that Doctor Gamaches (who was accounted one of the most able Divines of his Time) refused to give his Approbation of it, when requested of him; and that he wrote that Book whilst he was Confessor in the Convent of Chelles (3).

[B] His Catholico-Romanus pacificus is full of such Things as no good Papist can relish. It was printed at London in 1690, in the Appendix of the Fasciculus rerum expetendarum. The Author of the Appendix informs us, that he had seen three Manuscripts of This Work of Barnes; and he quotes these words of John Bafier, Professor of Divinity. "Barnus ille Irenæus (4) tametsi vitæ inculpatae & famæ integræ fuit, mediâ Lutetiâ correptus, suo habitu exutus, & quadrupedis instar barbarum in modum alligatus ad equum, & ita vehementissimè ævedus primo in Flandriam, deinde Romam, ibi in Inquisitionis barathrum, deinde in maniacorum ergastulum erat detrusus (5). — This good Irenæus, though of an unblameable Life, and unspoiled Reputation, was arrested in the middle of Paris, stript of his Habit, and tied upon a Horse, more like a Beast than a Man, in a very barbarous Manner, and so carried away by violence, first into Flanders, and then to Rome, where he was thrown into the Dungeon of the Inquisition, and afterwards into the Recepsacle of Lunatics."

[C] He was apprehended at Paris. They would have sent him away the same Day he was taken, if the Captain of the Watch had been as impatient, as the Father Procurator of the Benedictins of Douay was. But this impatient Person was forced to acquiesce till next Day, and then Father Barnes was carried in a Coach to Vilette, where two Benedictins waited to go along with him, and with the Guards, who were ordered to carry him to Cambray. He was bound on a Horse, and delivered to the Governour of Cambray, who sent him to the Castle of Wardeen (6). Father Theophilus Reynaud was in the wrong to speak of Orders from Albert of Austria for quiring him to return to Douay, or to retire into some other of their Monasteries. He lodged at Paris near the College of Navarre, afterwards in the College of Burgundy, and lastly in the House of the Prince of Portugal, where the Captain of the Watch arrested him the fifth of December 1626. He was writing an Answer to the Book intituled, Apostolatus Benedictinorum in Anglia, wherein he would have inserted his particular Opinions about the Discipline of the Church (d). Father Theophilus Raynaud, concealing himself under a fictitious name, wrote against his Treatise of Equivocations [D].

Perhaps it will be entertaining to the Reader, to find here the reason, why Barnes was an Enemy to the Jesuits [E]: I mean the reason, which they have published.

for That Archduke was dead a long time before Barnes was apprehended. I have quoted This Jesuit's Words in the first Remark.

[D] Father Theophilus Raynaud, concealing himself under a false Name, wrote against his Treatise of Equivocations. I speak of the Book entitled, Splendor veritatis moralis, seu de licito usu Equivocationis, pro Leonardo Lessa, adversus Joannem Barnefum Anglum Mnachum. It was printed at Lyons, in 1627, in 8vo: The Author takes the Name of Stephanus Emonerius. I have a stronger proof of it, than That, which Placcius formed out of two Passages of Father Alegambus (7), in one of which it is said, that Theophilus Raynaud composed, sub nomine alieno, the Treatise, of which I have just now given the Title (8); and in the other, that he concealed himself under the Name of S. Emonerius (9). This is my Proof. Father Abram says, in his Treatise de Mendacio (10), that Theophilus Raynaud acknowledged the Book of Emonerius, entitled Splendor veritatis moralis, for one of his Works, and that he may easily be discovered in it. Miror te hunc pro Theophili partu agnoscere. — I wonder you should take this for one of Theophilus's Productions: thus says one of Father Abram's Interlocutors; the other answers; "Quid ni vero agnoscam cum illum in suis " Moralibus suum esse fateatur (11)? Quem si abdicaret, nullo tamen negotio patrem vel ex ipsa " filii facie cæterisque corporis lineamentis agnoscere possemus,

Sic oculos, sic ille manus, sic ora ferebat.

"Why not, when he owns it himself in his Moral Works? And if he should disown it, it were easy to find him out to be the Father, from the Resemblance it bears to him in every part of it,

The Eye, the Hand, the Face exactly like.

Here is a Passage of Theophilus Raynaud, which shews, that he acknowledged the Confutation of Barnes to be his Work, and that this Benedictine was yet living in the Year 1650. "Dixi ego sane in præfatione operis de Equivocatione, adversus Cæctani germanum, bipedum omnium effrontissimum, Joannem Barnefum Anglum, qui vicenariio carcere, in quem curante summo Pontifice reclusus est, necdum detersit multiplicis adversus Deum, & Religionem Catholicam, ac S. Benedicti familiam, malignitatis rubiginem --- Societatem Jesu, &c.

(12). — I have said, in my Preface to that Work on Equivocation, against Cæctan's own Brother, the most hardened Wretch living, who, by twenty Years Imprisonment under the Jurisdiction of his Holiness, has not worn off the least Particle

"of the Canker of his abundant Virulency against " God, the Catholic Church, and the Family of St " Benedict --- that the Jesuits, &c."

[E] This is the Reason, why he was an Enemy to the Jesuits. On his Return from Spain into the Netherlands, he assisted at one of their public Disputations, wherein the Respondent proposed his Quodlibetal Thesis thus: An Joannes, in Hispania infamis, possit hic in Belgio absque peccato infamari. That is to say, Can John, being infamous in Spain, be innocently defamed in the Netherlands? Such Cases of Conscience have been examined by Soto, Molina, and several other Writers; but in a general manner, though with the Addition of some particular Circumstances. Those Generalities were not kept to in the Disputation, at which John Barnes assisted; for the Question was reduced to such precise Terms, by denoting in a particular Manner the time, and place, that he believed they meant him personally, and he would never be persuaded to the contrary, though they made very humble Protections to him, that they had no such design. He resolved to revenge himself, and make choice of the Subject of Equivocations. Theophilus Raynaud relates this, when he mentions the Answer, which he wrote against that Book of Barnes. "Ad singularia locorum ac temporum adjuncta, illis in oris per familiaria, difficultas restricta est. --- Clara locorum designatione petiuntur se ratum Barnefius, bellum indixit inconciliable Societatis Jesu Doctoribus; nec se ullis unquam vel contestationibus, vel mollibus ac propè supplicibus verbis, flecti passus est, ut nihil minus quam de eo notando cogitatum esse, in eo Thesium programmate ac prologo, persuaderetur (13).

— The Difficulty was urged with particular Circumstances of Time or Place, according to the Custom of their Disputations. — Barnes, thinking himself pointed at by the Place, whicb was named, declared perpetual War against the Jesuit Doctors; nor could he ever be prevailed upon by any Evidences, or the most candid and even humble Declarations, to believe, that there was not the least Thought of aiming at him in the Discussion of that Thesis. He does not forget to say, that Barnes was condemned to perpetual Imprisonment; and that, having lost his Senses, he was removed to the Hospital of Lunatics; "Barnefium, ob periculosas novitates, --- carceri esse mancipatum, postea autem emota mente, in satuorum ergastulo Transiberino, (vulgo gli Pazzarelli) conclusus est; ubi anno 1643, erat superstes (14). — Barnes, for his pernicious Innovations, --- was thrown into Prison, and afterwards, running distracted, was removed to the Madhouse on the other side the Tyber, (commonly called gli Pazzarelli), where he was living in the Year 1643."

BARON (PETER), Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge in the XVIth Century, was a Frenchman born (a). He excited some troubles in that University, by certain Doctrines, which he delivered there, in the Year 1590. It was pretended, that his Opinions came very near those of the Pelagians. Whitaker, Tindal, Chadderton, Perkins, &c. opposed them in their Sermons, Lectures, and Books; but, at first, they spared their Adversary's Name, because of his great Age. Perceiving afterwards, that he continued to dogmatize, and that he maintained an heterodox Hypothesis in his Summa trium de Prædestinatione Sententiarum; Whitaker formally declared himself his Antagonist, and refuted his Summa. The Matter was brought before Queen Elizabeth, and the Archbishop of Canterbury. A Convocation of Prelates, and Doctors of Divinity, met at Lambeth: Whitaker was summoned to appear there, who maintained the common Opinion with so much Strength, that it became gloriously triumphant. That of Baron was condemned, and nine Articles (b) were drawn up, the twentieth of November 1595, which which were received in the University by Public Authority. Baron was dismissed, and returned into France: which restored Peace to that University (c). Some think, that he was used too severely [A]. We shall see the Titles of some Works of this Professor [B].

[A] Some think, that he was used too severely.] The Extracts of a Book of Thomas Fuller, which Mr Des Maizeaux has been so kind as to send me, shall be my Commentary on this place. That Book is an History of the University of Cambridge, and is to be met with at the end of The Church History of Great Britain, from the Birth of Christ till the Year 1648.

"A Contest happened between Mr Chadderton, (afterwards Master of Emanuel College;) and Dr Baro, Margaret Professor (1), about some heterodox Opinions, vented by the same Baro, both in his Readings and Print, (viz. in his Commentary on Jonah, and Book de Fide). Whereupon the Doctor procured Mr Chadderton to be called into the Consistory, in the Presence of the Vice-Chancellor, Dr Hausford, Dr Harvey, and Dr Legge, where he utterly denied, that he had ever preached against the Doctor, but he propounded these Questions as erroneous and false.

1. Primus Dei amor non est in natura fidei Iustificantis. — The principal Love of God is not in the Nature of justifying Faith.

2. Fides Iustificans non præcipitur in Decalogo. — Justifying Faith is not commanded in the Decalogue.

"Many Papers, in Latin,* passed between them, and at last they were conceived to come nearer together.

"The end of Peter Baro's triennial Lectures began to draw near: now, although Custom had made such Courtesy almost a Due, to continue the same Professor, where no urgent Reasons to the contrary were alleged, yet the University intended not to re-elect him for the Place, meaning fairly to cut him off just at the Time, (which would be the less Pain and Shame unto him,) when his Years should be expired (2). He himself was sensible of it, and, besides, he saw the Articles of Lambeth, lately sent to the University, and foresaw, that Subscription thereto would be expected from, yea imposed on, him, to which he could not condescend, there"fore resolved to quit his Place. So that this his Departure was not his free Act, out of voluntary Election, but That whereunto his Will was necessarily determined; witness his own reply to a Friend, requiring of him the Cause of his withdrawing: Fugio, faith he, ne Fugarer. — I fly for fear I should be driven away.

"Some conceive this to be hard Measure, for which was used to one of Dr Baro's Qualifications: for, I. He was a Foreigner, a Frenchman, Turpius ejicitur quam non admittitur hospes. II. A great Scholar; for he that denieth Learning in Baro, (so witnessed in his Works,) plainly affirmeth no Scholarship in himself. III. An inoffensive Man for Life and Conversation; seeing nothing of Viciousness could be charged upon him, which otherwise, in his Contest with Mr Chadderton, had been urged against him. Lastly, an aged Man, coming hither many Years since, (when the Professor's Place as much needed him as he it,) and who had painfully spent his Strength in the Employment. Others alleged, that, in such Cases of Conscience, there is no Plea for Courtesy, and that Baro, as he was a Stranger, had brought in Doctrines to the infecting the University, the Fountain of Learning and Religion, and therefore Archbishop Whitegift designed the removing him from his Place (3).

This is, Sir, (they are Mr Des Maizeaux's Words) what Fuller says; and I chuse to translate him literally, though not so well, rather than run the hazard of deviating from his Sense. He takes notice, that all the English wrote Baro constantly, or Baroe, and that, in Original Writings, the Doctor signed Baro; from whence it might be concluded, that I should have called him Baro, and not Baron, unless it be said, that he latinized his Name, when he signed Baro, and that the English called him according to the Latin Termination. That which is certain, is, that the Name of Baron is much more used in France, than that of Baro, which is not altogether unknown neither, witness the Continuator of Astrea (4).

BARON (VINCENT), in Latin Baronius, a Monk of the Order of St Dominic, was much esteemed in the XVIIth Century, for several Books, which he published. He had the Famous Theophilus Raynaud for his Antagonist, and I do not know whether the Desire of encountering so famous a Champion, might not make him take, for that Jesuit's Work, what was really not so. He sometimes has acknowledged himself mistaken in his Conjectures on that Head. The Works of Father Baron, which are come to my knowledge, are, a Book, on Justification, against the Doctrine of the Calvinists; a Moral Theology, divided into three Parts [A], and an Apology for his Order [B]. In his Moral Theology, he has treated on the principal Matters in dispute between the Dominicans and the Jesuits. He was a famous Preacher.

[A] He composed a Moral Theology, divided into three Parts.] The first is designed against the Doctrine of Probability, adversus Laxiores Probabilistas

(1). He therein confutes Caramuel, who had wrote four Letters against the Dissertation, which Fagnano, Dean of the Prelates of Rome, had inserted in his Commentaries on the Canon-Law. Fagnano maintains strongly, that an Opinion, which is thought less probable, ought never to be preferred before that, which is thought more probable. Caramuel confuted him, and was confuted by our Vincent Baron. Father Theophilus Raynaud was refuted by the same Work, in relation to an Opinion of Suarez, condemned by Clement VIII. Suarez had maintained, that Confession might be made by Letters: Father Theophilus contrived some Expedients to defend his Brother against the Pope's Censure, and Father Baron wrote against those Expedients. He, at the same time, fell upon the Janfenists, since he maintained, against Wendrokius, "That sometimes, though very rarely, there happen Cases, wherein there may be an invincible Ignorance, as well of the Law of Nature, as of a positive Law (2)." In the second Part, he attacks Amadeus Guimenius, and is not satisfied with maintaining, that the loose Opinions, which are imputed to the Dominicans, are not their true Sentiments; he shews also, what Judgment ought to be passed on those Opinions. He acknowledges, in his Preface, the wrong Notion he had entertained in composing his Work: He thought, that Amadeus Guimenius was but a fictitious Name, which Father Theophilus had given himself (3). In the third Part he treats of Liberty, and of the Media Scientia; and he maintains, that the Fore-knowledge of God has no other Foundation, than his Decrees; and that this Fore-knowledge is so far from destroying Man's Liberty, that, on the contrary, it establishes it (4). This must not be taken for a Paradox; for whoever should say otherwise, would not follow the Definition of Liberty, which ought to be given in the System of Physical Predetermination: It is by virtue of the different Ideas of Liberty, that the Dispute may be spun out, and the Reader so deluded, as not to be able to judge of the ill Success of his Cause.

[B] — and an Apology for his Order.] It is a Latin Work, like the foregoing: It is an Answer to the

Here is a Memoir, which came into my hands since the first Edition of this Work (a). "Father Vincent Baron was born at Martres, in the Diocese of Rieux in Gascony. He entered into the Order of Dominican Friars at Toulouse in the Year 1622. He taught Divinity for several Years, with applause, in the Convent of the same City, and was Prior there, as he was likewise at Avignon, and in the General Novitiate of the Suburb of St Germain at Paris. He was Definitor for his Province, in the General Chapter held in the Year 1656. Where he presided at the Theses dedicated to Pope Alexander VII, which gained him the esteem of all the City, and of the whole Order. He was in the Assembly, when the Pope sent to tell the Definitors, and the Fathers of the Chapter, that he was under the greatest Concern to see so deplorable a looseness in Christian Morality, which had been introduced into it by certain new Casuists, exhorting them to compose another System, agreeable to the Doctrine of St Thomas. This engaged Father Baron to undertake those Pieces he composed on that Subject. He was again elected Provincial, and afterwards the Father General sent him Commissary into Portugal, on Affairs of Importance, wherein he was so successful, that the Queen, the Court, and all the Monks, gave testimony of his Merit by a public Act. He returned to Paris to the General Novitiate, and died there the Twenty first of January 1674, being seventy Years old. Besides several Latin Poems, which he left as a sample of his capacity in Literature, he published the Books, which I shall mention below [C]." You will find a very honourable Passage concerning him in the Historical Apology for the Censures of Louvain and Douay (b). The Congregation of the Index was not favourable to him [D].

the cruel Invektive of Father Theophilus Reynaud, entitled, De immunitate Cyriacorum à Censuris, and to him, who pretended to shew, that it is well if the tenth Part of all the Works, which are ascribed to Thomas Aquinas, be really his. Father Baron enters the List also, with Mr de Launoi, who maintained, that many Passages of the Fathers, cited in a Treatise of Thomas Aquinas, against the Greeks, are forged. This Dominican was not contented to write an Apology for his Order, he made also their Panegyric (c).

[C] He published the Books, which I shall mention below. What I am going to transcribe is contained Word for Word in the Memoir, from which I have taken the Addition to this Article. Theologia Moralis, Paris, 1665, two Volumes in 8vo. Primus Tomus ejusdem correctus, Editio secunda 1667, in 8vo. Libri Apologetici contra Theophilum Rainaudum, Paris, 1666, two Volumes in 8vo. Mens sancti Augustini & Thomæ de Gratia & Libertate, 1666, in 8vo. Ethica Christiana, Paris, 1666, two Volumes in 8vo. Responsio ad Librum Cardenæ, Paris, in 8vo. Heretici Convicti, Paris, 1668, in 12mo. Panegyrics on the Saints, Paris, 1660, in 4to. The Book entitled Ethica Christiana septemdecim loci, composed against one Matthew Moya, who had taken the Name of Amadæus, was censured at Rome, by the Intrigues of Cardinal Nitard, who was offended at it; and Capisucchi, the Master of the sacred Palace, who had approved of it, was turned out, and Father Hyacinthus Libelli, since Archbishop of Avignon, was put in his Room. Capisucchi was afterwards re-instated, and, since that, made a Cardinal. I do not find, in this List of the Works of Father Baron, the Exercitatio, which Mr de Launoi refutes with surprizing Sharpness, in one of his Letters, the fourteenth of his fifth Part. See the Remark [P], of the Article of (JOHN de) LAUNOI, at the beginning.

Two or three Months after I had received this Memoir, the following Account was sent me. "Apologia pro sacra congregatione Indicis ejusque Secretario & Dominicis, contra Petri à Valle clausa Libellum famosum incipitum, de Immunitate Auditorum Cyriacorum à Censuris; Romæ, typis — m.d.c.lxii, in 4°. Advertat lector præter innumera errata ex prælo passim sensum & stylum auditorum mutantia, addita nonnulla necessaria sermone simplici, & multa adjecta convitia: has autem labea tollit secunda editio. — An Apology for the sacred Congregation of the Index, and their Secretary, and for the Dominicans, against a Libel of Petrus à Valle Clausa, under the Title of The Exemption of Ecclesiastical Authors from Censure. Printed at Rome, 1662, in 4to. The Reader is to take notice, that besides innumerable Errors of the Press, which every where disturb the Sense and Style of the Author, there are some material Things added in plain Language, and much Scandal: but these Imperfections will be corrected in a second Edition. This second Edition was published at Paris, by Simon Piget, in the Year 1666, in two Volumes, divided into five Books. The first printed at Rome, at the Instance of Cardinal Capisucchi, then Master of the sacred Palace, who approved it, occasioned the removing of the same Capisucchi from his Office, by Alexander VII, a great Friend to the Jesuits. It was also put into the Index, the Twenty eighth of February, 1664."

[D] The Congregation of the Index was not favourable to him. Here is an Extract of their Decree, of the Twenty seventh of September, 1672. Duo primi Tomi operum Fr. Vincentii Baroni, inscripti Theologiæ moralis Summa bipartita, prohibentur: tertius vero præfati auctoris suspenditur donec corrigatur: ultimi autem duo Tomi ejusdem Auctoris, scilicet quartus & quintus, quinque libros apologeticos continentes, pariter prohibentur (6). BARONI (LEONORA), an Italian Lady, one of the best Singers in the World, flourished in the XVIIth Century. She was Daughter of the Fair Adriana of Mantua, and was so admired, that a great many fine Wits made Verses in her Praise. There is a Volume of excellent Pieces, in Latin, Greek, French, Italian, and Spanish, printed at Rome, under the Title of Applausi poetici alle glorie della Signora Leonora Baroni [A]. Those, who desire to know the particular Perfections

[A] There is a Volume of Pieces, in her praise, under the Title of Applausi poetici alle glorie della Signora Leonora Baroni. Nicus Erythraeus spoke of this Work, when he said, "Legi ego, in Theatro Eleonoræ Baronz, cantricis eximie, in quo omnes hic Romæ, quotquot ingenio & poetica facultatis laude præstant, carminibus, tum Etruscæ tum La-

tinæ scriptis, singulari ac prope divino mulieris illius canendi artificio tanquam faustos quosdam clamores & plausus edunt; legi, inquam, unum Lælii (Guidiccioni) Epigramma, ita purum, ita elegans, &c. (1). — I have read, in the Theatre of Leonora Baroni, the celebrated Singer, wherein all the Wits and Poets, here at Rome, have, in Italian Perfections of her singing, may read the Account given by a good Judge, who had heard her sing [B]. It is from him I have borrowed this Account.

"and Latin Verses, complimented and applauded her divine Skill in singing; I have read, I say, one Epigram of Lælius Guidiccio, so beautiful and elegant, &c."

[B] They may read the Account given by a good Judge, who had heard her sing. "She is endowed with fine Parts; she has a very good Judgment to distinguish good from bad Music; she understands it perfectly well, and even composes; which makes her absolutely Mistress of what she sings, and gives her the most exact Pronunciation and Expression of the Sense of her Words. She does not pretend to Beauty, neither is she disagreeable, nor a Coquet. — She sings with a bold and generous Modesty, and an agreeable Gravity. Her Voice reaches a large Compass of Notes, and is exact, loud, and harmonious; she softens and raises it without straining, or making grimaces. Her Raptures and Sighs are not lascivious; her Looks have nothing impudent, nor does she transgress a Virgin Modesty in her Gestures. In passing from one Key to another, she shews sometimes the Divisions of the enharmonic and chromatic Kind, with so much Art and Sweetness, that every body is ravished with that fine and difficult Method of singing. She has no need of any Person to assist her

"with a Theorbo, or a Viol, one of which is necessary to make her singing complete; for she plays perfectly well herself on both those Instruments. In short, I have had the good Fortune to hear her sing several times, above thirty different Airs, with second and third Stanzas, composed by herself. I must not forget to tell you, that, one Day, she did me the particular Favour, to sing with her Mother and her Sister: Her Mother played upon the Lyre, her Sister upon the Harp, and herself upon the Theorbo. This Concert, composed of three fine Voices, and of three different Instruments, so powerfully transported my Senses, and threw me into such Raptures, that I forgot my Mortality, and thought myself already among the Angels, enjoying the Felicity of the Blessed."

I have taken this from a Discourse on Italian Music, printed with the Life of Malherbe, and some other Treatises at Paris, in 1672, in 12mo, at the end of which are these Words: This Discourse was composed by Mr Maugars, Prior of St Peter de Mac, the King's Interpreter of the English Language, and, besides, so famous a Performer on the Viol, that the King of Spain, and several other sovereign Princes of Europe, have wished to hear him.

BARONIUS (DOMINIC), a Florentine Priest and Preacher in the XVIIth Century, wrote vigorously against the Church of Rome, and concurred with the Vaudois in Piedmont to maintain Orthodoxy; but, at last, he was esteemed a false Brother, because he maintained, that, in time of Persecution, it was not necessary to make outward Profession of the Truth [A]. Celsus Martinengue, Minister of the Italian Church of Geneva, wrote against him on that Subject, and Replies were made on both sides. These Books are become very scarce, I know not for what reason. Our Baronius composed a Mass according to his own Fancy, which he thought likely to reconcile the Differences betwixt the two Religions; but he found himself disappointed; for the Protestants rejected his Project (a).

(a) Taken from the Ecclesiastical History of the Vaudois, composed by Peter Giles, chap. 10, pag 62, 80, 81. Geneva 1644.

[A] He maintained, that, in Time of Persecution, it was not necessary to make outward Profession of the Truth. He did not therefore deserve the Name of Antinicomite, which Peter Giles gave him; but rather That of Nicodemite. Let us see in what manner That Historian speaks of him. "Dominic Baronius, says he (1), was a Florentine, a Popish Priest, and a Preacher of Repute, and who, in less dangerous Times, had shewn some Zeal for the true Religion, almost wholly embracing it, and condemning almost all the Papal superstitious Constitutions, except only some few Particulars, which though he retained, yet he treated them so ambiguously, that it could hardly be known what was his Opinion of them, as appears in several Italian and Latin Treatises composed by him, and particularly in That of human Constitutions, wherein he shews what may be admitted, and what ought to be rejected. In that Book, among several great Errors, which he condemns in the Popish Church, he says of the Mass — "I do not set down the Passage, which Peter Giles alleges; but here is what follows that Quotation: "He wrote, in the same Style, concerning the other Popish Superstitions: But, for all this, he endeavoured to persuade, that, in very dangerous Times, and Places, People might dissemble outwardly what they thought of such Errors, and even go to Mass, provided they constantly retained the Truth inwardly, and did not heartily concur in any of those Errors. He said, that, in such Times, and Places, the Minister of Truth ought to make it his Business to shew his Disciples the Tares, and to teach them how to discern them from the good Grain, and to make them hate the Tares, and love the Wheat with all their Heart: But, as to the outward Profession, that he ought to let the Lord work his Pleasure, without exposing himself, and others, to great Dangers. — Celsus de Martinengue — confuted, by a notable, and long, Treatise, all the Reasons Baronius alleged in Support of his Opinion; and Replies were made on both Sides for some Time. And Baronius, thinking himself able to reconcile the two Religions, reformed the Mass, in order, that, agreeably to what he had laid down, People might go to it with a good Conscience; and sung it himself, according to his own Reformation, and acted in the same manner, in several other Points, thinking, by that means, to please every Body, by trimming. But his Proceeding was condemned by a great number of the truly Faithful, not only by Words and Writings, but also by their Actions, since they chose rather to part with their earthly Goods, and this temporal Life, than to shew any outward Consent to Popish Idolatry, and erroneous Superstitions (2)."

BARTAS (WILLIAM DE SALUSTE Seigneur du) A French Poet. See SALUSTE.

BARTHIUS (GASPAR), one of the most learned Men, and fruitfulest Pens, of his Time, was born at Custrin in the Country of Brandenburg, the Twenty second of June 1587 (a). His Family was of an ancient Nobility [A]: His Father, Charles Barth, Professor of the Civil Law at Francfort on the Oder, Counsellor to the Elector of Brandenburg, and his Chancellor at Custrin, died the sixth of February 1597, at Halberstadt, from whence his Widow withdrew to Hall with her self in the War against the Vandals in the Retinue of the Emperor Lewis the Debonair, in the Year 856. He was a Bavarian; he commanded the Cavalry, and was killed in That War, as Cyriacus Spangenbergius observes (1). The Grandfather of Barthius was one of the chief Gentlemen of Bavaria: he went and settled in the Circle of the Upper-Saxony, where he bought several Estates, and, in the Year 1545, he was honoured by the Emperor, and the States of the Empire, with many noble Titles. "Avus idem noster, ne in his terris minor esset gentilibus suis alibi viventibus, à Carolo quinto, Con- filio & Senatus-consulto omnium Imperii statuum tum Spiræ præsentium, ex integro Cæsareæ Ma- jestatis & sacri Imperii auctoritate utriusque nobilis & miles Tornearius declaratus est, omniaque liberæ & veræ nobilitatis privilegia accepit, cum singulari integritatis, doctrinæ, & strenuitatis testimonio, anno Christiani M.D. XLV (2). — That the Rank of my Grandfather, in this Country, might not be inferior to That his Family held in other Places, he was knighted, and declared Noble, both by the Em- peror Charles V, and his Council, and by Decree of all the States of the Empire, then assembled at Spire, and received all the Privileges of a free & true Nobility, with a particular Testimony of his Integrity, Learning, and Courage, in the Year 1545." He enjoyed the Office of Chancellor at the Court of Albert of Brandenburg, Elector of Mentz, Archbishop of Magdeburg, and Cardinal. One of his Ancestors, whose Name was Herman, was Grand Master of the Teutonic Order, towards the end of the XIIIth Century (3). The old Annals make mention of him: Munſter speaks of him in his Cosmography; and the Catalogues of the Grand Masters of That Order, even those composed by Jerom Megiserus, do not forget him. Others of the same Family are to be met with in the Relations of Tur- naments, and in the Collections of the Coats of Arms of principal Noble Families of Germany. The Fa- ther of Gaspar Barthius had several Brothers (4), who all died without Children (5). One of them had been Master of the Horse to some great Princes, and did not want Learning (6). Barthius says, that he shall be the last of his Family: Superſtes nunc ego omnibus paterni mei nominis familiam meam univerſam mecum rebus humanis brevi educam (7). You see him in the Front of several of his Works, with the Title of S. R. Imperii Eques. The Thoughts of his Fa- mily dying with him was extremely afflicting, and lay very much at his Heart: He often considered this melancholy Subject; which makes me believe, that he was very easily comforted on the Death of his Wife. She was barren, and likely, according to his reckoning, to outlive his Virility; for, otherwise, he would not have spoken in the manner we have seen. But, when he least suspected it, his Wife died. He soon took another, to see whether he could avoid the hard Fate, he had so much feared, of being the last of his Family. He looked upon himself no longer an useless Load on the Earth; this might be proper to call himself, while he despaired of having any Offspring. He had the Hoppiness to beget Sons and Daughters by a second Marriage; but he forgot to correct the Places of his Commentary, where he ap- pears to be out of Hopes of leaving a Successor. If he did not care to correct his Manuscript, he ought, at least, to have added something, at the end of it, concerning his second Marriage being more fruitful than the first. If I am asked, How I came to know, that his first Wife was not dead, when he complained of being the last of his Name? My Answer will be, That I infer it from this small Calculation. Barthius's Funeral Oration informs me, that he became a Widower in the Year 1643, and that his Mother died at Hall, the Twenty second of January 1622. Now he had been dead but eighteen Years, when he made his Complaints: "Ego inutile ferè pondus terræ omnibus mei nominis mortalibus superſtes supervivo integro octodecennio (8). — I am almost an useless Load on the Earth, having outlived all

"my Family full eighteen Years, and being the last of my Name." His first Wife must therefore have been alive at that time.

[B] His Childhood was admired by great Men.] If I am allowed to extend the Word Childhood a little farther than usual, my Text will be very true; since Scaliger set a great Value upon the first Productions of Barthius. "Cujus virtutem juvenilem ac cordatos ausus Josephus Scaliger suscepit adeo, ut divinationis instar hanc illi de Barthio vocem exci- disse compertum sit, natum esse adhuc unum æter- nitati ingenium, quod si ad maturitatem perveniret, literas aliquandiu vivere posse (9). — — — — Wolfe (10) Spizelline in Temple Honoris referato, pag. 381. "juvenile Capacity, and judicious Performances, Jo- seph Scaliger so greatly admired, that, in a sort of prophetic Spirit, he declared thus concerning Bar- thius, that there was now, one Genius more born for Eternity, and, if this should live to Maturity, Learning might furvide some time longer." Daui- mus says, that some learned Men were not ashamed to learn of This young Scholar: "Eo adolescenti uni do- ctore non erubuerunt Taubmannus, Siberus, Schmi- dius. Quæ Gruteri aliorumque apud externos vi- rorum de eo tum lata fuerint judicia, domi eorum literæ aservatæ partim, partim lætæ, docent (10). — — — — Taubmannus, Siberus, and Schmi- dius, thought it no Disgrace to be taught by This Youth. The Judgment, which Gruterus, and other Foreigners, passed on him, may be seen in their Writings, either published, or in their own Hands." Another learned Person, who had been Barthius's School-fellow, speaks thus of him: "Novi — — — ante annos ferè quinquaginta pueri præſtabiles minas, cum ſub Wilkii p. m. manu eſſemus συχολαſαι: novi ante hos XLIII. annos Wite- bergæ adoleſcentem florentem gratia apud non- nullos, θαυμαſόμενον ἔγω κατὰ τὸν ἀξίον (11). — — — I knew him — — — almost fifty Years ago, a very promiſing Lad, when we were Schoolfellows, under Wilkius: I knew him, about Forty three Years ago, a Youth in great Esteem a- mong ſome, and much admired by ſome of his own Age."

[C] He composed several Books, while he was a beardless Boy.] Mr Baillet, who has placed him in his Catalogue of Famous Children, will give us the most particular Account of him. He informs us, "That, at twelve Years of Age, Barthius turned the Plalter of David into all sorts of Latin Verses; and that, in the same Year, he published other Poems in the same Language; and that the Col- lection of Silvæ, Satires, Elegies, Odes, Epigrams, and Iambic Verses, which he caused to be printed at Wittenberg in the Year 1607, comprehends all the Poetry he composed from the thirteenth to the nineteenth Year of his Age (12)." We have it from himself, continues Mr Baillet (13), "That, be- ing yet but in the sixteenth Year of his Age, he wrote a Treatise, or Dissertation, by way of Letter, on the Manner of reading Latin Authors usefully, by beginning with those from Ennius to the end of the Roman Empire; and continuing them, from the Expiration of the Latin Tongue, to the Critics of these latter Times, who have restored the an- cient Authors." It is a Performance, which the Author says cost him but Twenty four Hours; but it is so close, and so full, that it shews Bar- thius must, even at that Time, have read a pro- digious deal; and that this Reading was so far from being indigested, or confused, that it was accom- panied with a perfect Judgment, &c." To this may be added, that he was but eighteen Years of Age, when he composed a Commentary on the Cæiris of Virgil, which was printed at Amberg, in the Year 1608, and contains much Learning.

[D] He had a wonderful Facility in making Verses.] Barthius, having observed, that Statius, in some Mea- sure, congratulated himself on having spent but two Days about the Epithalamium of Stella, which con- tains Two hundred seventy eight Hexameters, adds, that Statius did not expose himself to the Censure living Languages, and made it appear, by his Translations out of Spanish and French [F], that he was not contented with a superficial Knowledge of them. It is surprising to find, what a number of Authors he must have read, from his Adversaria, and Commentaries on Statius and Claudian. Most Critics are satisfied with reading Prophane Authors; but this was not enough for him; he acquired also a great Knowledge of Ecclesiastical Authors, especially those, who lived in the middle Ages. His constant application to Books obliged him to relinquish all manner of Business, and to lead a retired life at Leipsic (c). He resolved early to disengage himself intirely from the World, and the Study of Prophane Authors, in order to apply himself only to the great Affair of Salvation [G]. He put this design in execution in the latter Years of his Life; and it appears, by his Soliloquia, published in 1654, that his Thoughts were deeply engaged on Eternity [H]. He died the seventeenth of September 1658, a little above Seventy one Years of Age (d). The Manuscript Works he left behind him [I], those which were of Horace (14), since he did not make Two hundred Verses in an Hour, as That Poet did, whom Horace ridiculed (15). "I find a great Hyperbole, con- tinues he, in That Criticism, though I am not "ignorant what it is to make a great many Verses "in a little time; for, in three Days time, I translated "into Latin the three first Books of the Iliad, "which Translation contained a little above Two "thousand Verses."

[E] And also published a great many. For, besides those mentioned in the Remark [C], he published a Poem at Frankfort, in 1623, entitled Zodiacus vitae Christianae; Satyricon, plerique omnia verae Sapientiae mysteria singulari suavitate enarrans. It is divided into twelve Books. In the same Year, and Place, he published Epidorpidum ex mero scazonte libri III. in quibus bona pars humanae sapientiae metro explicatur. His Epigrams, divided into thirty Books, and dedicated to King James, appeared under the Name of Tarraeus Hebius (16). The four Books Amabilium Anacreontis decantati, were printed in the Year 1612. He wrote a Paraphrase on Aesop's Fables in Verse, a Translation of Musaeus also in Verse, and a Poem on Quintus Smyrnaeus, in Verse, was ever published. He speaks of it in the Five hundred eighty fourth Page of the third Volume of his Statius.

[F] He composed Translations out of Spanish and French. I do not know, that he translated any thing out of the latter Language, besides the Memoirs of Philip de Comines, which he put into Latin. He had much more Inclination for the Cassilian Tongue, as he has shewn in several Places; and Don Nicolas Antonio was not ignorant of the Praises, which he bestowed on the Spanish Books (18). I know but two Spanish Books, translated into Latin by Barthius; one is the Celestina, the Author whereof was unknown to him; the other is the Continuation of the Diana of Montemajor. Here is the Title, which he gave to the Translation of the Celestina. Pornodidascalus Latinus. De lenonium, lenarum, conciliatricum, servitiorum, delis, veneficis, macchinis plujquam diabolicis; de miseris juvenum incautorum qui forem etatis amoribus inconcessis adducunt, de miserabili singulorum periculo & omnium interitu, at Frankfort 1624. He added some Notes to his Translation. The Spanish Author of That Work, or of That Tragi-Comedy, was Rodericus Cota. The Continuation of the Diana of Montemajor, translated by Barthius, is the Work of Gaspar Gil-polo. Barthius's Translation was printed, at Hanau, in 1625, under the Title of Erotodidascalus, seu Nemoralium libri V. Mr Baillet says (19), That he also translated the Pornodidascalus of Aretin into Latin. Without doubt, it is the same Book, which Daumius speaks of in these Terms: "Reliqua quae ----- Barthius publicavit ex Hispanico Colloquio P. Aretini de las Damas ex Hispanico ab ipso translatò, & a nobis recuso nuper, adjecto cognoscere poteris (20). ----- The rest ----- which Barthius published from Aretin's instructive Dialogues, "On Ladies of Pleasure, translated by him out of Spanish, and revised by us, will appear from the Work itself here subjoined." You may conclude from hence, that This Latin Translation of Aretin, was not made from the Original, but from a Spanish Translation.

[G] He resolved early to disengage himself intirely from the World, ----- to apply himself only to his Salvation. Having said, that his Mother had some Fore-sight of her Death, three Years before she died, and that he survived That good Mother eighteen Years, in perfect Health, except a Weakness in his Sight (21), he adds; "Cupio autem coeptis scribendis "laboribus demum aliquando defungi, & totum me "Christo dedicare, quam rem saepius jam orsum habens infinita bellorum & bellicorum tumultuum "exactionumque impedimenta haectenus suspenderunt. ----- My Desire is to quit, at last, all farther "Thoughts of writing, and dedicate myself intirely "to Christ, which I have already very often attempted, but have hitherto been prevented by the "interruption of Wars, and Tumults of Wars, and "other Hardships." To know at what Time he spoke thus, one need only remember, that his Mother died in the Year 1622. See the end of the Remark [A].

[H] His Thoughts were deeply employed on Eternity. Here is the Testimony, which Theophilus Spizellus has given of him: "Sacrum nimirum ad Deum "sinceramque pietatem Barthius meditabatur accessum, plurimis pie literatorum ac Deo sacrorum "hominum exemplis incitatus. Quo de imprimis "testatur insigne SOLILOQUIORUM OPUS, extremis vitae temporibus à Barthio publicatum, flagrantissimis ad Deum suspiriis oppido plenum, & vel Augustino scriptore dignum, quod etiam hemiplecticus quotidie revolvere, & per priorum meditationum vestigia denud cogitationes suas coelo immittere, consuevit; quinimo divinum amorem, quem intimis fibris semel imbibisset, continuis precum ejaculationibus alendum jugiter atque roborandum putavit, quousque à sacrae pariter ac literariae solitudinis diversorio, anno aevi nostri octavo & quinquagesimo, aetatis vero septuagesimo primo emigravit (22). ----- Barthius was studying "to make his Approaches to God, and true Piety, "being encouraged to it by the Examples of many of "the piously Learned, who had devoted themselves to "God. This his admirable Piece of Soliloquies particularly demonstrates, being published by him in "his latter Years, and abounding with the most fervent Ejaculations to God, worthy of St Augustin himself, and which Barthius, though lame of one "Side with the Palsy, used every Day to turn over, and by pursuing the Thread of his former Meditations, to send his Thoughts again to Heaven. He made it his Business to nourish and strengthen incessantly that divine Love he had established in his Heart, by the continual Exercise of Prayer, 'till he departed from this sacred and learned Retreat in the Fifty eighth Year of our Century, and the Seventy first of his Age."

[I] The Manuscript Works he left behind him. Daumius has informed the Public, that there were found, among this Author's Papers, the second and third Volumes of his Adversaria (23); some Notes, and Glossaries on the Writers of Palestine, published by James Bongars; Benedictus Paulinus Petroscurus de Vita S. Martini, & Paulinus Pelleus cum Tertuliani Jona, Juretiq; & Barthii animadversionibus; XXI Books of Epigrams: XII Books of Anacrentics; The Zodiac of the Christian Life, corrected and enlarged in several Places: several other Poems, most of which had never been printed, and the rest had been corrected: Glossaries on Valerius Maximus, and on the Epistles of Pliny the Younger. Daumius declares, that, if the Cruelty of the Times, entirely prejudiced against Literature, will permit it, and if, by the Liberality of some Mecenas, any Benefit may accrue by it printed [K], those which were burnt together with his House [L], and those which he is known to have wrote, but are lost no body can tell how [M]: I say all these Works make such a prodigious bulk, that it is scarce possible to conceive they could be performed by one Man. I do not know whether any, who have lived to turn grey in the dust of a Registry Office, ever wrote so much as this Author has done. There is a Story published, which had better have been suppressed, concerning a Tour, it is pretended, he made into Holland with a fair Lady [N]. Some learned Men have complained of the printing of That Story, it to his Heirs, all those Works may one Day be printed. Si diritas permittat temporum politioribus bene Mufis profus infensum, fructusque si aliquis Mecenatum benignitate ad reliquos tu maxime heredes sit redundaturus (24). I have not heard, that any of those Manuscripts have ever stirred out of his Heirs Hands, except the Paulinus Petrocarius de Vita S. Martini, which Daumius took Care to get printed in the Year 1681. The Bookellers will not catch at that Bait as they did formerly, when Barthius touched their Honour, by declaring, in a Preface, that he had a very great Number of Books, which waited only for the Courtesy of the Bookellers, to appear in public (25); and that they should be printed, as soon as he could meet with an industrious Bookeller to undertake it (26). This produced a very speedy Effect, as to some of his Works, and a slower one as to others; but, nevertheless, most of these Books were printed, when that Preface was mentioned in the Bibliothèque Universelle. Let us see in what Terms it was done; the Passage deserves to be set down; it contains a Criticism somewhat satirical, but grounded on Reason. "There is a Preface before it, mentioning the Titles of some Books, which the Author promised to bestow on the Public, but few of which have been printed (27), because he found no Bookellers, as he himself observes (28), who had the same Zeal, as himself, for the Advancement of Literature. But, if all his Works were like this, it may be pronounced, that we have lost little more than a great many Quotations of no great Use. Not but that there might be some good Things in them, as well as in this: But they are, as it were, hid under so great a Number of Pages of the Ancients, that it requires a great deal of Patience to find them out (29)."

[K] Those which were printed. I will only here take notice of the chief of them: A great Volume in Folio, entitled Adversaria, divided into sixty Books. Quibus ex universa antiquitatis serie omnis generis loci tam Gentilium quam Christianorum scripturum illustrantur & emendantur, cum rituum, morum, legum, formularumque observatione & elucidatione, cum undecim indicibus, VII autorum, IV rerum. At Frankfurt, 1624. The Author has shown in it a surprizing Degree of Memory, Reading, and Learning; it is pity we cannot say as much of his Clearness, and Judgment. He left two other Volumes of Adversaria of as large a Size, without reckoning his having revised and corrected the first. De quo Adversariorum Tomo secundo aut tertio, uterque enim jam peractus est, primo etiam recensito in iis & amotis nebulis quas illi inducere livor voluit (30). The whole contains an Hundred and eighty Books. Let us proceed to some other Titles. Galli confessoris Christianae doctrinae compendium, seu sermo Constantiae habitus; C. Barthius recensuit & Animadversionum librum adiecit Frankfurt, 1623, in 8vo, Phæbadus contra Arianos cum animadversionibus. Guil. Britonis libri Philippius cum notis. Claudiani Edicii Mamerti de Statu Animæ, libri III. cum Animadversionibus; Cygneæ, 1655, in 8vo. Ænæ Gazæi Dialogus de Immortalitate Animarum, cum Zacharia Mitylenæo Philopolo Christiano, Græcè & Latine, Leipzig, 1655, in 4to. Barthius published a new Translation of Ænææ Gazæus, and made use of That of John Tarrinus, as to Zachary, both which Works he adorned with Notes. Soliloquia rerum Divinarum; Cygneæ, 1654, in 4to. A large Volume of Notes on Claudian, printed in the Year 1650, in 4to. And three large Volumes upon Statius, printed in 1664, in 4to. He was not well pleased with That Edition of Claudian, because the Printer had not made use of a good Corrector (31). It is pity that there is no Table of Matters, nor, in general, any Index. His Commentaries on Statius are very free from that Fault.

[L] Those, which were burnt, together with his House. It was a Country-house, which was burnt by the Carelessness of the Farmer, or some such other Person, who inhabited it. "Cum villa nostra urbana non bello, non latronum manu, sed perfidi incolæ temeritate conflagravit (32). When my Country-house was burnt down, not by the Misfortune of War, or the Violence of Robbers, but by the Audaciousness of the treacherous Inhabitant." It is, without doubt, That which Daumius calls Incendium Sellarhusanum, which happened in the Year 1636. "Etiam nonnulla flammis, says he (33), incendio Sellarhusano, anno M.DCC.XXXVI. absumpta periere. Some also perished in the Flames, in the Fire of Sellarhuse, in 1636." By this Misfortune, Barthius lost his Index Appulejanus (34), all that he had wrote on Tertullian (35), his Index on Thucydides, &c. "In quo scriptore (Thucydide) per bellicos hos triennales motus & excessiones ingens damnum accepimus, indicem enim tam in auctorem quam Scholiam (qui recitator tamen est quam vulgo attenditur) confeceramus, in eum parte Bibliothecæ perit (36). Flammæ ingens scrinium manu mea scriptis chartis effertum, simul abfusserunt: & sic perierunt mihi multa juvenilia & puerilia scripta (37). In which Writer (Thucydides) by the Disturbances and Removes, which War has occasioned for three Years together, I have met with great Loss; for I had made an Index, both to the Author and his Scholiast, (who is much more modern, than he is generally esteemed,) this perished with part of my Library. The Flames . . . destroyed a great Desk full of my Manuscript Works all together; and so went many of my childish and youthful Productions." He says, that his Library had been already twice plundered, when the Fire made that new Havock. Adfesse Bibliothecæ non possumus miris modis duabus vastationibus depopulate, & uno incendio vix dimidiatim ereptæ (38).

[M] Those, which were lost, no body can tell how. Daumius says, that, after the Author's Death, they looked in vain for his Commentary on St. Augustin. De Civitate Dei, his Book De Superstitionibus Veterum, his Treatise De dubiis Scripturis, his Characters, and several other Writings of that Nature. Barthius quotes very often the Books I have just now mentioned, and gives an advantageous Idea of them. It is very likely, considering the Nature of their Subjects, that they were none of the work of his Works. He had begun a great many others, to which he referred his Readers, as if they had been already printed. See the Index Autorum of his Statius, at the Word Barthius.

[N] There is a Story published, concerning a Tour, it is pretended, he made into Holland, with a fair Lady. Mr Colomies mentions it on the Authority of Isaac Vossius. He was very much to blame to print such Stories, which he had only met with in Conversation. Every body knows, that they, who like to entertain a Company pleasantly, are furnished with a great many little Stories, to which they add such Circumstances as they think proper, to make them more singular and diverting. They would not take this Liberty, if they knew, that what they say would be printed. However it be, the Story runs thus: "Mr Vossius told me one Day, that Barthius, being come from Germany to Harlem, to see Scriverius, he brought a very fine Lady along with him; and that Scriverius had no sooner seen her, but he found the means to make Barthius drunk, that he might entertain the Lady with more Liberty; which succeeded according to his Desire. Nevertheless, he could not do it so well, but that Barthius, being recovered from his Drink, had some Suspicion of what had past; which increased in such a manner, that he carried the Lady back again in a great Story, and pronounced it a Fable [O]. Barthius had two Wives (e). He married the first in the Year 1630, and the second in the Year 1644. The first died in the Year 1643, without bringing him any Children. The second bore him a Son and three Daughters, and survived him (f). He happened to be four times in besieged Towns, and came off without any other loss, than only once of his Cloaths and Arms (g). He complained of having been ill used by Vossius [P]. He took Scaliger's Part very warmly against Scioppius [Q], but was no Friend to the Learned Reinefius. The latter had discovered too many of his Faults, not to make him angry [R]. It was impossible that an Author, who wrote so many things, and with so much Precipitation, could escape the judicious Censure of Reinefius. It has been pretended, that it was not always for want of Memory, that

"a great Rage, and suffered her to be drowned in "the Rhine (39)." It must not be denied, that Bar-thius had a bad Reputation, as to his Morals. One of his best Friends confesses it; but he maintains, that this was ill-grounded. "De moribus quæ invidi nugati sunt quorumque causa ego ignotum meo
"malo abhorrebam, rem aliter quinquaginta hæc cum
"eo conversatione comperi. Adeo quicquid de eo
"dixerunt scripseruntque ego hæcenus profus credere
"abnu, cujus intima nescio an æque alii patuerint
"(40). ----- As to the Vice, which have been "maliciously objected to him, and on account of which "I had an ill Opinion of him before I knew him, to "my own Disadvantage, I have found, by fifteen Years
"Conversation with him, that he is intirely clear
"of them. So that I have hitherto absolutely contra"dicted all the Stories, which have been told, or "wrote, about him, and I believe no body knows
"him so intimately as I do."

[O] Some learned Men have complained of the printing of that Story, and pronounced it a Fable. See here what Morbofius has said of it; "Quibus (Colomefii
"opusculis) adjicitur libellus Gallico sermone, cui ti-"tulus A Collection of Particulars, in quibus multa de
"eruditiss familiariter à Vossio aliisque suppeditata,
"laudato semper autore, vir ille effutit, quæ insigni-
"tis sane temeritas fuit. Multa tamen in his sunt
"mendacia, quæ illud de Casparo Barthio horren"dum, qui concubinam suam Rheno suffocaverit,
"quod ejus cum Scriverio amores deprehenderit (41).
"----- To which (Colomefius's Works) is added
"a small Piece in French, entitled, A Collection
"of Particulars, wherein, with the biggest Indiscre"tion, he blabbed out several Stories, familiarly told
"by Vossius, and others, of learned Men, always re"membering to name his Author. Among these are "a great many Lies, such as that horrid one about
"Caspar Barthius's drowning his Mistress in the "Rhine, on account of an Intrigue he had discovered
"between her and Scriverius."

[P] He complained of being ill used by Vossius. Few Persons had cause to make the like Complaint; for never was so learned a Man, as Vossius, more complaisant or modest to those he censured. However, let us see Bar-thius's Complaint at length. "Quo loco vir doctiss. (42)

"utriusque notæ hic habebitur, cum ex Commenta-
"riis Lutatians infinit, quorum nec centesimam par-
"tem Servianæ & Higinianæ Commentationes vin-
"dicare possint. Idem præstantissimus vir incogitate
"eodem loco scribit Lutatium à Lindebrogio primum
"editum (43). ----- In, which Place I had learned "Man also judges favourably of Lutatius, that his "Comment and Glosses are full of Learning, and "worth reading. And, indeed, much more truly and "justly, than John Gerard Vossius, who boldly af"firmed, that Lutatius had borrowed the greatest Part "of his Performance from Servius and Higinius. This "most learned Vossius has also, in another place, with "equal Injustice, (as I have demonstrated elsewhere,)
"taken the Liberty to accuse me, who never offended
"him, of Impertinence and Absurdity, on the Insiga-
"tion of some envious Bonstlers, who are themselves
"remarkably impertinent; by which he has, deserved-

"ly, drawn upon himself both those Accusations, since
"Servius and Higinius's Commentaries cannot lay "claim to a hundredth part of what is contained in "those of Lutatius. The same excellent Man has also
"basely asserted, in the same Place, that Lutatius
"was first published by Lindebrogius."

[Q] He took Scaliger's Part very warmly against Scioppius. Three Books, wrote against that great Man's Enemy, are ascribed to him; and his Name was found out by way of Anagram, in That of Tarræus

[R] Reinefius discovered too many of his Faults not to make him angry. They were such Faults as an ingenious Man could not have defended; they were Faults which deserved Condemnation, which is so much the more shocking and provoking. "A. Cl.

that Barthius contradicted himself [5]. It is no wonder his Memory, how strong soever it might be, should often deceive him, considering his method of composing his Books [7]. He made no Collections, and scarce ever corrected what he had once written.

[5] It has been pretended, that it was not always for want of Memory, that Barthius contradicted himself. "Some have observed, that, when he gives his Judgment, he falls now and then into Contradictions, for want of Memory (46)." Daumius pretends, that those, who took notice of that sort of Contradictions, knew nothing of Barthius's Designs. "He wrote, says he, all that came into his Mind, this Day one thing, and to morrow another, on purpose that, when he should look over them again, some time or other, those Contradictions might engage him to examine things more nicely, and give him a better Opportunity to correct, or confirm, what he had written. *Memini in publicis academicis Disputationibus diversæ sententiæ ejus loca exagitata fuisse. [7] It is no wonder his Memory — should fail him, considering his Method of composing his Books. We must hear his own Words. "Puto jam tale quid supra notasse. Non enim potest, ut nullis penitus rebus adjuncti, omnium strictam memoriam habeamus. Omnino enim aliter nos commentamur, quam solent homines etiam litteratissimi, dum auctores legunt, excerptes quædam atque ea deinde excerpta in Silvam Observationum, eam porro Silvam in Commentaria redigentes. Nunquam tale quid factum à nobis est: Sed ut cuique auctori e narrando bene facere volumus, arcepto illi Animadversiones hoc genus imputamus, folius memoriæ beneficio nixi, quam marginalibus nonnunquam prius Notis instruiamus, dum cum libris veteribus Editiones comparamus. Cætera omnia è calamo fluent elegantè & minuto literarum ductu. Nec unquam scriptio repetitur: nec ullis lituris cruciatur: quarum nec decem aliquas hæcenus hi Commentarii agnoverint (49). ----- I think I have before observed some such thing. For it is impossible for me, who use no sort of Assistance, to have a perfect Memory of every thing. For my Method of commenting is quite contrary to that commonly used by the most learned Men, who, in reading Authors, take Notes all along, and then afterwards reduce those Notes into a Collection, and that Collection into Commentaries. I have never done any thing like this: But, as I would do Justice in explaining each Author, I ascribe these sorts of Observation to every one respectively, by the sole Strength of my Memory, which is sometimes first directed by Marginal Notes, made on my comparing the several Editions. Every thing else flows from my Pen in a small and exact Letter. Nor do I ever write any thing over again, or blot out what I have once wrote. These Commentaries have not bitberto met with ten Instances of this Kind." I do not know whether it is right to boast of such a thing; I think the Public deserves more Respect.

BASINA, Wife of Childeric King of France, and Mother of the Great Clovis, had been married to a King of Thuringia. Childeric being forced to leave his Dominions, because his Lewdness had so exasperated the People, that he had reason to fear the worst from them, fled (a) to the King of Thuringia. He was received by him with all manner of Respect; without doubt Basina, who was a very beautiful Princess, entertained him admirably well. Experience has always shewn, that those lascivious Princes, who are expelled their Country, do not renounce their Gallantries in the place of their Retreat. Childeric was an Example of it: He fell in Love with Basina; and, finding her not cruel, he made no scruple to pursue the matter so far as to enjoy the Wife of that same Friend and good Neighbour, who furnished him with a place of Refuge [A]. He engaged her in so close an Amour, that she could never after quit it. The French recalled Childeric eight Years after they had expelled him (b). Basina could not be easy with that Prince's Absence. She left her Husband, and went to Childeric; and, when he asked the cause of her Visit, she answered, ingenuously, that it was her Love of him [B]; and that if she had known any Prince beyond the Seas, who could have [A] Childeric made no scruple ----- to enjoy the Wife of that same Friend ----- who furnished him with a place of Refuge. There would be ground enough to believe it, though the Historians had not related it. Would Basina have run after Childeric, if he had not loved him, and tasted with him the Pleasures of Love? But we have the Testimony of Historians: These Words are to be found in the Author of the Archievements of the Kings of France, in the seventh Chapter. "Dum fuit in Thuringia cum Basina Regina uxore Bisini Regis ipse Childericus commixtus est. — While he was in Thuringia, Childeric conversed criminally with Queen Basina, the Wife of King Bisinus." Aimonius relates the same thing in the eighth Chapter of the first Book, "Dicebatur idem princeps consuetudinem stupri cum ea habuisse, cum exularet. — The same Prince was said to have continued an adulterous Commerce with her in his Exile." Rorico is more expressive: I will quote him in the following Remark.

[B] She answered him ingenuously, that it was her Love of him. According to Gregorius Turonensis, in the twelfth Chapter of the second Book of the History of the French, the Answer was thus expressed: "I very well know that you are an useful and valiant Man. It is on this account, I am come to live with you; for, be assured, that if I had known of any Body, in the Provinces beyond the Seas, who could have been more useful to me than yourself, I would have gone and desired to have lived with him." The Abbot of Marolles, who thus translated the Text of Gregorius Turonensis, adds a Remark to advertise us, that Basina's Meaning, in this Discourse, is equivocal. This is not unlikely: I do not believe that Childeric had given any proofs of his Military Valour in Thuringia: So that the Valour, which Basina spoke of, might be of another nature, and more useful to a Queen than a Martial one; and I am tempted to believe, that, both in Gregorius Turonensis, and in Rorico, we ought to read virilitatem & virilitorem, instead of utilitatem & utilitorem. The Equivocation will still remain. Basina answers, I know your Virility, and that you are a very brave Man. Those words are better connected than the following, I know you are an useful and valiant Man. Let no body object the Immodesty of these words, I know your Virility; is there not as much in a Woman's saying to her Gallant, I know your usefulness? However it be, Here is the Latin of Gregorius Turonensis: "His regnantibus si-have been more agreeable to her, she would have gone to him. Childeric was charmed with this discourse, married Bafina, and had a Son by her, who was a very brave Prince, and embraced the Christian Faith. If this Woman's Conduct was worse than That of Helena [C], That of Childeric, all Circumstances rightly considered, was not better than That of Paris. Father le Cointe's excuses are but very trifling [D]. The Author of the Galantries of the Kings of France, relates the Visions of Bafina's Bridegroom better than Mr de Cordemoi [E].

Since

" mul Bafina relicto viro suo ad Childericum venit. Qui cum follicite interrogaret quâ de causâ ad eum de tantâ regione venisset, respondisse fertur, " Novi, inquit, utilitatem tuam quod sis valde strenuus, ideoque veni ut habitem tecum. Nam novis; si in transmarinis partibus aliquem cognovissim utiliore te, expectissem utique cobitationem ejus. At ille gaudens eam sibi in conjugio copulavit." The anonymous Author of the Gesta Regum Francorum (1), Fredegarius (2), and the Monk Rorico, relate Bafina's Answer in the same manner as Gregorius Turonensis; only Rorico has explained it much better, and expressly said, that the Discourse of that Woman was full of Lewdness. Which is so far from weakening my Conjecture concerning virilitatem & viriliorem, that it strongly confirms it. These are the words of Rorico: " Bafina quoque Sifini regis uxor, apud quem latuisse praeconstravit Childericum, sapiens relicto viro thoro confortium nostri Regis est experta. Quamobrem & eum nec multo post in Franciam est sequuta, cupiens loco uxoris habitare cum eo. Quam Childericus cum imperate conspexisset, & ad quos usus de tam longinqua provincia ad eum properasset inquireret, illa postposito pudore muliebri, ut erat nimis luxuriosa, tale fertur dedisse responsum: " quoniam novi utilitatem tuam & pulchritudinem, & quod sis habilis & strenuus, & domo veni ut habitem tecum, nam si in extremis terræ finibus utiliore te cognovissem, & hunc nihilominus expectissem. Complacuit regi mulieris sermo factus, & eam gaudens sibi sociavit in uxorem (3). " ----- Bafina also, the Wife of King Sifinus, with whom, we have before shewn, that Childeric had taken refuge, often left her Husband's Bed to share that of our King. For which reason, not long afterwards, she followed him into France desiring to live with him as his Wife. Childeric being surprized at so unexpected a Visitor, and desiring to know the Cause of her Undertaking so long a Journey, she, laying aside all female Modesty, as being of too amorous a Constitution, returned this Answer: It was because I know you useful and comely, able and vigorous, that I left my Home out of a Desire to live with you; for if I had known of any one more so than yourself, though he had been in the furthestmost Parts of the Earth, I would have gone to him. The King was much taken with her pleasant Answer, and married her with much Satisfaction." This whole Relation of Rorico shews, that this Woman did not compliment Childeric as a brave Warriour, but as a complete Champion in Love.

[C] Her Conduct was worse than That of Helena. To give every Body their Due, I ought to say here, that this pretty Comparison is none of my own; I find it in a modern Writer (4). " Bafina, says he, the Mother of Clovis, was not contented to prostitute her Honour to Childeric I, who fled for Protection to her first Husband Bisinus, or Bafinus, King of Thuringia; but did worse than Helena, who at least would be carried away, whereas this Woman came into France of her own Accord, and with so much confidence, that she durst tell Childeric, that, if she had known a braver Man, and worthier of her Love, she would have gone to him to the end of the World."

[D] Father le Cointe's Excuses are but very trifling. He takes it ill, that Amonius should say, that Childeric married Bafina before the Death of her first Husband (5). He pretends, that Amonius is the first who said it, and loaded the Birth of Clovis with such an Ignominy. He adds, that this Historian is not to be credited, considering the Distance of the Time he lived in, and his Prepossession against the Merovingians. He brings two other Reasons, one that the Germans, who were the Stem of the French, did not permit Adultery; the other, that, if Childeric had married another Man's Wife, he would have exposed himself to the same Danger, which forced him to leave his Kingdom eight Years before. From all which Considerations he chuses rather to believe, that Bafina, not being able to endure the ill Treatment she received from her Husband, fled into France, and that she did not marry Childeric before she had certain News of her Husband's Death. He remarks, that others say she was divorced, and that therefore, under Paganism, nothing hindered her from marrying a second Husband. He refers us to Robertus Cenalis (6). Let us examine a little into this Dispute. In the first place, I say, that, if the Silence of the Authors, who preceded Amonius, is a good reason, it must no longer be said, that the King of Thuringia abused his Wife, or that he divorced her, or that he was dead before Childeric married her. These are Facts mentioned by none of the ancient Authors. In the second place, does not Gregorius Turonensis say, that Bafina left her Husband, and that her first Answer to Childeric pleased him so well that he married her? Is not this almost saying in express terms, that she was Childeric's Wife before her first Husband was dead? In the third place, the Passage out of Tacitus, which Father le Cointe alleges to prove, that the Germans disapproved Adultery, shews, that Childeric was exempted from the General Law (7); for whatever was the real Motive of the Woman's coming to him, she declared it was grounded on that Prince's Valour: Besides, the Punishment of Adultery was left to the Husband's Choice, and Bafina was no longer in her Husband's Country. Not to observe, that Laws are seldom made for Sovereigns. Lastly, Childeric had nothing to fear from the Mutiny of his Subjects upon this account; he married a Stranger who was come to seek him: What harm could this do the French? I own that they had revolted eight Years before; but then they were alarmed, one for his Daughter, another for his Sister, &c. for Childeric, at that time, gave himself up to debauchery in a very violent Manner (8). The Affair of Bafina did not at all concern them; would they have ever thought of breaking the Reconciliation by espousing the Quarrel of a King of Thuringia?

[E] The Author of the Galantries of the Kings of France, relates the Visions of Bafina's Bridegroom better than Mr de Cordemoi. These are his words: " It is reported, that having intreated Childeric not to lie with her on the Wedding-Night, she sent him three times into the Court-Yard of his Palace, desiring him to observe, without fear, the Visions which should appear before him; and that by her occult Science, he was entertained the first time with " Unicorns, Lions, and Leopards; the second time with Bears and Wolves; and the third time with Dogs and Cats; from whence she concluded, that those various Animals presaged the Diversity of the Manners and Customs of the Race, which was to proceed from their Marriage. It will be so much the more readily believed, that this report is only a Fable invented at pleasure, if it be observed, that the ardent Passion, which that Queen had for Childeric, would, in all probability, never have permitted her to lose so much time, while she knew how to pass more pleasantly, than to lie in Bed alone, while her Lover was entertained with those pretended Apparitions (9)." It cannot be denied, but that the Reason he alleges to confute that old Story has some force; but it would have had much more, if Bafina's forwardness itself did not make it too probable, that the Ardour of her Passion had already received some considerable Relief. After what had passed between them, neither Childeric nor she were like to pay much regard to the Marriage Ceremony, or to defer their Embraces till the Nuptial Solemnity had authorized them: And for that reason Bafina might well let him rest till the following Night. Mr de Cordemoi pretends, that Bafina

Paucissima in tim nuptia sententia adulterii quorum penna pfectus & Maritis permittitur. Their Marriages are very strict, and no part of their Customs is more to be commended. For they are almost all sole Persons who allow but of one Wife, except only to some few, who are indulged with more than one, not in regard to their Lust, but their Nobility. Altho' they are a numerous Nation, Adultery is very rare among them, and is always let intimated ately to be punished at the Discretion of the Husband.

Since the first Edition of this Work, I have read what Father Daniel has published, against those, who say, that Childeric was expelled by his Subjects, that he was recalled at the end of eight Years, and that the Queen of Thuringia came after him, &c. This Author thinks, That what Gregorius Turonensis has wrote upon it, is nothing more than an Abstrait, or Abridgment, of some Romance current in his time (c); and that the Visions, Childeric is pretended to have had on his Wedding Night, and which have been added to the Story of Gregorius Turonensis, have the Air of a Romance, as well as the rest (d). I shall mention the Quarrel commenced with Pâquier, and the Answer returned to his Criticism [F]: From this Remark, it will appear, that Disputes occasion many Faults to be committed, as well of the Heart, as of the Understanding.

was already with Child, and near her time, when she desired her Husband to look for Apparitions three times successively the same Night, at the Gate of his Palace, and he quotes Fredegarius for it (10); but it is certain, that his Witnesses contradicted him: Fredegarius says, that those Visions preceded the Consummation of the Marriage. Cum primâ nocte jugiter stratu junxissent, dicit ad eum mulier, hæc nocte à coitu virili abstinemus. — Cumque Basina hæc universa narrasset, abstinere se castè usque in crastinum.

[F] I shall mention the Quarrel commenced with Pâquier, and the Answer returned to his Criticism.] Let us first relate Pâquier's Words: "Our ancient Writers place Clovis among the Legitimate, but do not consider, that, in their Account of his Life, they affirm the quite contrary. They all agree in this, that Childeric, having been expelled the Kingdom for his Extortions and Cruelties, retired to Thuringia, where, having been honourably received by the King, he fell in Love with his Wife Queen Basina: infomuch, that being afterwards recalled by the French, he carried her away, and married her, violating thereby the Law of Nations, and of Hospitality; and yet the Great Clovis was born of that Marriage (11)." Let us see, in the next place, the Censure of Father Garasse: He says, "That Pâquier adding something of his own to the fabulous Report of the ancient Chroniclers, sets forth, that Childeric, having fled for Shelter to the King of Thuringia, fell in Love with his Wife, and ravished her, and carrying her into France married her in contempt of every Thing sacred (12)." He goes on thus (13), "Master Pâquier might have despised such Dreams, and learned from Paul Emilii, and Gregorius Turonensis, the falsity of this Narration; and the Sieur Du Pleix has related it very judiciously in the Life of Childeric — (14). The ancient Chroniclers of France never judged or dreamed, that Clovis was a Bastard, for having married Basina, or any other Thuringian Woman; for if he married Basina, he might have learned of the French Historians, that she came herself into France, after the Death of her Husband the King of Thuringia, and married Childeric her second Husband, from which true and lawful Marriage Clovis was born." Let us pass to the Answers returned to Garasse. First he was censured for having opposed Gregorius Turonensis to Mr Pâquier, who yet — forms his Doubts on that Author's Words (15). They were quoted and confirmed by the Testimony of Aimonius — who seems in some things to go farther than he; for he remarks, that Basina forsook her Husband, Priori abjecto viro (16). Then to the Testimony of those two Historians was added That of Nicollis-Gilles. These are his Words, in the sixteenth Page of the Life of Childeric: "During the time that Childeric was with Basinus, King of Thuringia, he fell in Love with his Wife, whose name was Basina; and after he was recalled to his Kingdom, the said Queen Basina, who doted very much on him, forsook the said Basinus, King of Thuringia, her Lord and Husband, and came to Childeric, who forgetting the former Kindnesses which he had received, married her, by whom he had Clovis the first Christian King of France (17). It was observed, that Richard of Vajebour authorizes this Opinion in his Antiquities of the Belgie Gaul, and that all our modern Historians follow it. But it was thought sufficient to quote Belle-Forrest, who said, "That Childeric determined to marry, but in so doing he appeared very ungrateful to his Host, the "King of Thuringia, whose Wife he debauched and married, without troubling himself for the wrong done to Basinus, or the Reproach that he might receive for it (18)." At the Conclusion it was said, that all the Authors, who have been quoted, are as authentic, and judicious as your (19) Logician Du Pleix, who lent you his Whim in this Passage, to authorize your want of Judgment." The mistake was not forgotten, which Garasse made, when he said, that Clovis married Basina (20). It was called both "an impious and malicious Ignorance; for by that means he would make the first Christian King of France more abominable than those brutish Ethiopians, who, as St Jerom says against Jovinian, defiled their Mothers Bed without any Distinction (21)." Instances of the like Abominations were quoted there, with many Exaggerations, and long Declamations.

This Dispute shews us part of the Corruptions, which prevail in most Writings of this Nature. The Apologist passes over one of the Faults which had been censured: He does not justify Pâquier, nor does he own, that he was rightly accused as to that Article; I mean the Rape of Basina. Our ancient Chroniclers have not mentioned it, and therefore Pâquier aggravated Childeric's Ingratitude: he made Additions, which were both fabulous and scandalous. The Authority of Gregorius Turonensis might well be alledged against him, and nevertheless his crafty Apologist supposed, that this Historian had only been alledged, in relation to the other parts of Basina's Adventures, and on that Supposition founded the most insulting Reproaches. Here are already three great Corruptions; not to acknowledge That Part of the Remarks of a Critic, which is good and just; to dissemble That, which is favourable to him in his Quotations; and to apply intirely, with much noise, to That only which may be turned into a disadvantageous Sense. Here is another Irregularity: Garasse censured some Faults, and committed others in his Censure. Gregorius Turonensis was for and against him in different Respects; he made no distinction, but quoted him in a general manner, and placed him between Emilius and Du Pleix. Ought he not to have given him the first Rank? He perplexed himself wretchedly about a pretended Marriage of Clovis with Basina. This was done heedlessly: It appears plainly, that a Hurry of Mind, and a Distraction common enough among Authors, made him write contrary to what he thought; the Sequel of his Discourse evidently shews he did not believe that Clovis was the Husband of Basina. Yet Pâquier's Apologist falls violently upon that Passage: he takes it to be a capital Crime: His Zeal for the first Christian King of the French grows warm, and he calls the Figures of Rhetoric to his Assistance. Is this to act honestly? His Adversary had shewn him an Example of a like Corruption; for he had very wrongly armed himself with the Appearance of a great Zeal for the Honour of the Nation, on account of their first Christian King. He had preferred a Kind of Impeachment for a Crime of State, very unjustly, since, except the Rape, Pâquier had only followed our ancient Historians, and modestly represented their Consequences. How shameful is it, that Authors should be suffered to take the Liberty to engage Sovereign Princes in their petty Quarrels?

It is much more useful to make Readers sensible of these Faults in Writers, than to criticize Historical Fallhoods: and therefore I hope what I have just now observed will meet with Approbation.

SOME Examples of the Faults of Authors.

BASNAGE (BENJAMIN), the Son of N. Basnage, Minister of Norwich in England, and afterwards of Carentan in Normandy, was born in the Year 1580. He devoted himself to his Father's Profession, and was also Minister of Carentan; nay he continued to all his Life, though other more considerable Churches, and particularly that of Rouen, desired to have him for their Minister. He considered his first Church as his Spouse, from whom nothing but Death could divorce him; and therefore he would not make use of the liberty, which the National Synod of Charenton had given him, in the Year 1623 [A]. He assisted in that Synod, as a Deputy of the Province of Normandy. In the Year 1631, he was again named by that Province to assist in the National Synod of Charenton; but the King forbade him to go thither, and took his Church from him. He was presently after restored to it, and obtained leave to sit in that Synod, as a Deputy of Normandy. The Remonstrances, made to his Majesty by that Assembly, produced this good effect. He had given such Proofs of his Capacity and Prudence, that he was elected Moderator of the National Synod of Alençon in 1637. This Assembly wanted a Moderator, furnished with many Talents; for they had very nice Matters to handle. The Disputes about Universal Grace had made a great noise; it was to be feared, that a Theological War would break out in the Reformed Churches of France, more formidable than a severe Persecution; Mens minds were already very much heated, and prepossessed. This Synod settled Matters on a right foot, to which the Prudence and Conduct of the Moderator very much contributed. He was associated with the Moderator in the National Synod of Charenton in the Year 1644. This Assembly deputed him to the Queen-Mother, who gave him some Marks of her Esteem. He had a great number of Disputes with the Controversitists; he wrote against the Church of Rome, and they against him (a). His Treatise of the Church was much esteemed (b): He undertook a Work against the indiscreet Votaries of the Holy Virgin, which remained imperfect. He died at Seventy two Years of Age, in 1652, which was the Fifty first Year of his Ministry. He left two Sons, who made his Name very Illustrious, both upon their own, and their Childrens, account [B]. It must not be forgot, that he was deputed to King James, and that, by That Prince's leave, he went into Scotland, where he did great Service to the Churches in their Temporal Interests. King James's Letter of Leave styles him Deputy from all the French Churches. He is often mentioned in the Synodicon in Galliâ Reformatâ; but That Work, being in English, does not always observe the true Orthography of proper Names [C], which sometimes produces Confusion.

(a) Left vain, and Dragonis are the chief who wrote against him.

(b) If I am not mistaken, it was printed at Rouen, in the Year 1612.

[A] He would not make use of the Liberty of quitting his Church, which was granted him by the Synod of Charenton, in 1623.] The Provincial Synod of Normandy had permitted him to leave his Church; That Church had appealed about it to the National Synod, and That Appeal was rejected by the National Synod of Charenton, in the Year 1623. However our Benjamin did not leave his Church.

[B] He left two Sons, who made his Name very Illustrious, both upon their own, and their Children's, Account.] The eldest, ANTONY BASNAGE, was born in the Year 1610, and followed his Father's Profession, and was Minister at Bayeux. He signalled himself by his Constancy and Courage in the last Persecution; the Prison of Haere de Grace, into which he was put at the Age of Seventy five Years, did not shake his Resolution. When the Edict of Nants was repealed, he was set at Liberty, and fled into Holland: He died at Zutphen, in the Year 1681, aged Eighty one Years. He left a Son, whose Name is SAMUEL BASNAGE, Sieur de Flottemanville (1), who had been Minister with him of the Church of Bayeux, and is at present at Zutphen. He is one of the most learned Ministers, who left France. He had already published a Book in Latin (2), which is a Continuation of the Critical Observations on the Annals of Cardinal Baronius, which Cajetan had begun. He is now writing an Ecclesiastical History (3). I have wrote the Article of the other Son of Benjamin Basnage.

[C] He is often mentioned in the Synodicon in Galliâ Reformatâ, which does not always observe the true Orthography of proper Names.] For Example, in the Ninety fourth Page of the second Volume of the Synodicon in Galliâ Reformatâ, mention is made of the Deputies of Charenton, Sainte Mere & le Val de Serre. It ought to have been said, Carentan, Sainte Mere Eglise, & le Val de Serre. In the Seventy fifth Page Benjamin Basnage is filed Minister of Charenton; and, in Pages 259, and 274, Minister of Quarentin; and, in Page 322, Minister of Sainte Mere. It should be Sainte Mere Eglise;

and it ought to have been observed, that Carentan and Sainte Mere Eglise are two Places, which made but one and the same Church among those of the Reformed Religion. They had, indeed, each of them a distinct Place of Worship; but, as one was looked upon as annexed to the other, there was but one Pastor, and one Consistory for both. At Page 89, it is said the Conference of Constantine, instead of the Conference of the Cotentin. These are Faults of Orthography, which may confound Readers, and make them think, that there were Churches, in Normandy, called Sainte Mere, Charenton, and Quarentin. A Person, who should be employed by Booksellers to make Additions to a Geographical Dictionary, might imagine he had made a considerable Discovery, by finding those three Parishes in a Country, where the Geographers had not yet perceived them. Faults are like Sparks of Fire; That, which is at first but an Alteration of a Letter, becomes sometimes a Complication, or Heap of monstrous Falsities. It must be remedied early, principiis obsta. Here are also Mistakes of another Nature. The Author of the Synodicon makes mention (4) of one Peter Basnage, Son of Anthony, and Grand-son of Benjamin, and says, that this Peter Basnage had no Church in the Year 1637. This is a Mistake. Anthony Basnage had but two Sons; the eldest called Mr de Flottemanville, who was born in the Year 1638. The younger was named Francis, and followed the Profession of Arms, and died in the Year 1685. The same Author takes (5) Mr Basnage, Minister of Rotterdam, to be the Son of Benjamin Basnage; but he is only his Grandson. These small Faults, which I find myself obliged to discover for the Instruction of Readers, do not hinder me from believing, that Mr Quick's Work (6) is very curious and useful, and that all the Reformed of France are very much obliged to him for the Pains he has taken to make such an ample and exact Collection of their Synods, and for the long Preface, which he has added to it.

BASNAGE (HENRY), Son of the foregoing, was born at Ste. Mere Eglise in Lower Normandy, the sixteenth of October, 1615. He was one of the most able and eloquent Advocates of the Parliament of Normandy, into which he was admitted in the Year 1636. There was no considerable Cause, which he was not employed in. He went to Paris, with the Deputies of the Province of Normandy, on account of the * Tax called Tiers & Danger: It was he, who drew up the Memorial of the Province, and who was made choice of to defend that Cause. At the request of the Marquis de Maignon, he took another Journey to Paris, to regulate the Shares of the Succession with the Marquis de Seigneulay (a); and it is well known, that he would have been concerned in the general Review of the Common Laws of France, if the Project, formed about it, had been put in execution (b). In the Year 1677, he was nominated Commissioner for the Affairs of Religion, and worthily discharged that Trust. He was equally successful in Consultations, and Pleadings; and has made it appear, that he could prove as good an Author, as an Advocate. The Common Law of Normandy, which he published with very ample Commentaries in the Year 1678, was so much valued, and sold so well, that a Second Edition of it, in Two Volumes in Folio, was published in the Year 1694. At the same time was printed a third Edition of his Treatise of Hypothecæ, or Pledges. And, notwithstanding his great Age, the Author had the care of those Editions: his Judgment and Understanding continued unimpaired. This is very rare, and happens only to those, who have had both a lively Imagination, and a strong Head; which was his Character. His Religion did not hinder those, who were at the Head of the Parliament, and the rest of the most considerable Members of that illustrious Body, from having a great Esteem, and a particular Kindness, for him. He received all manner of Civilities from M. de Mombelon, first President of Rouen, to whom he dedicated his Common Law of Normandy in the Year 1694. He died at Rouen, the twentieth of October, 1695, aged eighty Years and four Days. If he had not the pleasure of seeing his Children in his old Age, yet it was a great Comfort to him to hear of the Honour, which they acquired in Foreign Countries by their excellent Writings [A]. He had also the Satisfaction to know, that his Son-in-Law, Mr Bauldri, Professor of Sacred History at Utrecht, had made himself very much esteemed by his Lectures, and by a learned Commentary on the Treatise of Lactantius de Mortibus Persecutorum (c).

[A] If he had not the Pleasure of seeing his Children - - - yet he heard of the Honour, which they acquired, in foreign Countries, by their excellent Writings. His eldest Son, JAMES BASNAGE, was but a little above Twenty two Years of Age (1), when the Church of Rouen desired him for their Minister, in the Room of Mr le Moyné, in the Year 1676. He served that Church with much Applause from that time, 'till the Revocation of the Edict of Nantz. Then he retired into Holland, and settled at Rotterdam, where he is Ordinary Minister (2). The Latin and French Books, which he has already published, and chiefly his admirable Answer to the Bishop of Meaux, have fully justified those, who promised his History of the Church would be a very complete Work; which has been yet farther made good by the Publication of the Work itself (3). His other Works are the Examination of the Methods proposed by the Assembly of the Clergy of France, for the Re-union of Protestants to the Church of Rome, printed, at Cologne, in 1684. The Epistle of St Chrysostom to Cæcilius the Monk, together with three Epistolary Dissertations, printed, at Rotterdam, in 1687, and reprinted in 1694. The Holy Communion, or a Treatise on the Necessity and Means of communicating worthily, printed, at Rotterdam, in 1687, and several Times since. A Treatise on Conscience, with Reflexions on the Philosophical Commentary, printed, at Rotterdam, in 1696. The History of the Jewish Religion, from JESUS CHRIST, to the present Times, by way of Supplement to Josephus, actually printed, at Rotterdam, in five Volumes in 12mo.

His younger Brother, HENRY BASNAGE, Sieur de Beauval (4), was admitted Advocate in the Parliament of Normandy, and pursued his Father's Steps; but the Troubles, on account of Religion, made him rather choose to retire into Holland, than to follow a Path so glorious in the Eyes of the World. He was very young, when he published a little Piece on the Tolerance of Religions, which was wrote with a great deal of Spirit and Judgment. He has acquired, and is daily maintaining, an immortal Reputation over all Europe, by publishing the History of the Works of the Learned. The Disputes he had with Mr Jurieu often interrupted him in that Work, and produced several very lively and sharp Pieces, on both Sides. His Correction of Furetiere's Dictionary, which he has improved with several Additions and Emendations, and an infinite Number of Examples, taken from more polite French Writers, is a Work of very great Use. He is again actually revising it.

Though these Gentlemen are yet living, there is a Necessity of mentioning them, to prevent their being continually mistaken the one for the other, as has been already done in some Books. See the Remark [C] of the foregoing Article, and this Passage of the Bibliothèque Universelle: Wherein it is shewn, that the Author of the History of the Journals is not very well acquainted with Messieurs Basnage. "I have already said, that this Work (5) is very necessary; but I must add, that it would be much more so, if he, who wrote it, had been better informed; for he has committed several Mistakes, which discredit the whole, 'till they be corrected. For Example, speaking of the History of the Works of the Learned, which is known to be wrote by "Mr de Beauval the Advocate, he says, that a French Refugee Minister is the Author of it, and that his inserting in the Title Page, By Mr B Docteur of the Civil Law, is only to conceal himself the better: That This Minister, and Author of That Work, is the same, who wrote against the Bishop of Meaux, and against Baronius, confounding, at this rate, three very different Persons. It is true, we may very well excuse him on this Article; for it is very rare to see one single Family produce so many famous Authors; and they, who are not well acquainted with every Branch of it, may very easily confound them (6)." This Reflexion is both ingenious and judicious.

BASTA (NICOLAS), by Nation an Epirote, was a good Officer of Horse in the Spanish Service in the Netberlands, where the Duke d'Alba brought him in the Year 1567 (a). He signalized himself in the Defeat of la Nove before Engelmünster in 1580 (b). The Duke of Parma gave him a very honourable Testimony [A], four Years after, by sending him to the Assistance of the Elector of Cologne. His Father, whose Name was Demetrius, had born Arms forty Years in the Service of the House of Austria (c). He was undoubtedly related to George Basta [B], which is sufficient to prevent the Censure of those, who might perhaps be apt to blame me for publishing this Article. When a Person deserves a place in a Dictionary, he in some measure opens the Gate to his Relations. Let this be observed once for all.

Some ſay he was his Brother (2), and obſerve, that four famous Hiſtorians (3) have aſcribed a glorious Action of George to Nicolas; it is the Succour thrown into la Fere in the Year 1596. Bouteroue has not been guilty of That Fault; he very rightly gives the Name of George to him, who performed That Action (4). Few Warriors will conſent to ſuch Alignment of Glory, and brotherly Love ſeldom reaches ſo far. The anonymous Author, who publiſhed the Hiſtory of the Archduke Albert, in the Year 1693, gives the Name of Nicolas Baſti to him, who brought a Convoy of Proviſions into la Fere.

BASTA (GEORGE), a famous General, in the beginning of the XVIIth Century, was originally of Epirus (a), but born in a Village called la Rocca, near Tarentum. He commanded a Regiment of Epirote, or Albanese, Horſe, when the Duke of Parma took Poſſeſſion of the Government of the Netberlands in the Year 1579; and he perfected himſelf in the Military Art under ſo great a Maſter as That Duke, who, ſoon diſcovering George Baſta's Merit, made him Commiſſary General of the Horſe in the Year 1580 [A]. There was no conſiderable Enterprize, in which he did not aſſign him a principal part. During the Siege of Antwerp in 1584, he had Orders to keep the Field, to hinder any Succours from entering into the Place; and, in 1588, having reinforced the Troops, which beſieged Bonn, he contributed very much to the taking of that Town (b). In the Year 1590, he followed the Duke of Parma into France, to the Aſſiſtance of the League; and, in the Year 1592, he had the command of the Rear-guard during the firſt Retreat (c). He was alſo concerned in the Expedition of Count Charles of Mansfeld, in France, in the Year 1593 (d). After which, he went to make ſome Campaigns in Hungary, and returned into the Netberlands, where, in the Year 1596, he was charged with a very difficult Commiſſion, which he executed very much to his Honour (e); this was to throw a Supply of Proviſions into la Fere, then beſieged by Henry IV. Never was more Conduct, Secrecy, and Diligence, ſeen, than he made appear on that occaſion. But, without doubt, the beſt Theatre of his Exploits was Transilvania and Hungary. In the Year 1601, he obtained a ſignal Victory over Sigismund Battori, who had cauſed himſelf to be elected Prince of Transilvania. The Imperialiſts loſt ſcarce 300 Men; but Battori loſt above 10000 Men, 110 Colours, 40 Pieces of Cannon, and all the Baggage of his Army. The Town of Claufenberg was beſieged ſoon after, and forced to yield to the mercy of the Conqueror. Baſta rid himſelf of a troubleſome Rival, who had ſhared the Honour of that Day with him, I mean the Waiwode of Walachia, whom he cauſed to be killed in his Tent, on ſuſpicion of his holding a private Intelligence with the Turks. The Year following, he quite ruined the Affairs of Battori, by the taking of Biſtric, and the Defeat of Mofes, Prince of the Scicules: So that Battori, humbly deſiring a Peace, renounced all his Pretenſions, and was ſatisfied with obtaining the Quality of a Baron of Bobemia, by way of Favour. In the Year 1603, Baſta again defeated the Army, which Mofes had raiſed, and perhaps he would have forced the broken remains of it in Temefwære, if the approach of the Winter had not hindered him from beſieging that Place. The Severities, he exerciſed, the following Year, againſt the Proteſtants of Transilvania, did the Emperor great Injury. He cauſed the like to be praſticed in Hungary by the Count de Bel-joieuſe, which made

[A] *The Duke of Parma ----- made him Com-

caſion to obſerve, that, in thoſe Times, That Office was but of a new Creation in the Netberlands. That Duke d'Alba brought it thither from Italy in the Year 1567, where it lately owed its Birth to Ferdinand Gonzague, Governor of the Milonezza. The Duke d'Alba conferred it on Anthony Olivera, de-

King of Caſtile, had ſent for from France, to ſerve a-charged That Office very well, and it was, during his Sickneſs at Caudebec, that the Cavalry, falling off from the good Diſcipline, under which he had kept it, did not perform it's Duty ſo well in the Attack, which the Royaliſts made, upon the Duke of Parma, in 1592 (2).

made Stephen Boskai take up Arms, who soon found himself strong enough to obtain a Victory over the Imperial Troops, which That Count commanded. Basta could only repair this Loss in part; for if, on the one hand, the Siege, which he laid to Cassovia, disengaged the Count de Bel-jouense, he was, on the other hand, obliged to raise it (f). In 1605, he had the Vexation not to be able to hinder the Turks from making themselves Masters of Gran (g); but he had at least the comfort, by his Encampment near Comorra, both to become an invincible Barrier against them, and to charge them advantageously, upon their going to take their Winter Quarters. The Peace, which was made with the Turks, the Year following, and the little time he lived afterwards, silenced the Historians as to any farther Account of his Exploits [B]. He was honoured with the Title of a Count (b). Some say the Turks never had any Advantage over him [C]. We must not forget, that he is an Author [D], and in very great Esteem [E].

[B] The Peace ----- and his Death ----- silenced the Historians, as to any farther Account of his Exploits.] Bonifacio Vannozzi, in a Letter dated in January, 1608, says, that two Letters, wrote by G. M. Praga, the Seventeenth and Twenty fourth of December, 1607, informed him of George Basta's Death (3). I fancy that this G. M. Praga had been Secretary to this General. He lamented the Loss of this Master, and commended the Kindness, which Count Charles, and the Countess his Mother, shewed him (4). I take notice of this, only to shew that this General did not die without lawful Issue. The Advice, which was given to G. M. Praga, makes me think, that he had a Mind to write the History of his Master: That Advice is very good. Vannozzi represents to him, that, if a Man desires not to pass for a Flatterer, he must undertake the particular History of some famous Action, in which the Person, whose Life he writes, had the principal Part. He points to one, as to George Basta, and adds, that, by managing it in this manner, he would have an Opportunity of representing the glorious Actions of a Man, without seeming to affect it. The great Advantage of this Method is, that it does not oblige an Historian to speak of the Imperfections of his Hero; whereas an entire History of his Life requires, that he should be represented, not only with his Virtues, but his Vices too. Now how commendable soever a Person may be, he is not without his Faults; and sometimes the bad Qualities are as numerous as the good. He quotes, on this Account, what Livy says of Hannibal: "Alcuni per fuggir'ill nome d'adulatore, tanto ambizioso, quanto dannato, si danno à scriver' un' ation publica, o un tal membro di essa, nella quale habbia parte principale colui, di cui noi intendiamo istoriar l'attian: e la vita: verbi grazia, volendosi porre in Carta la vita del fig. Co. Basta, si potrebbe pigliare à discriver' un' accidente della guerra d'Ungheria, fassi il tumulto e la Seditione de Ribelli, od altra impresa, nella quale S. E. havesse hauuto parte principale: & così dissimulatamente metterli à dir delle sue prodezze, con molto proposito, e fuor di sospetto; che hoggi di per lo più non si leggono vite e narrationi di Grandi, che non habbiano del fauoloso: E per cotali scrittori son tenuti à dire il vero, e fuggir la Menzogna: Stando che, così non fusi' egli, non vi sia alcuno tanto laudabile, che non habbia i suoi Nei: Onde saggiamente Livio, dopo una gran diceria à favor d'Annibale, chiuse il periodo così: Æquabant vitia virtutes: Perché, come peritissimo Maestro sapeva, che non si fi poteva, ne dovea tralasciar' indietto i cenni de' vizi, del descritto per virtuoso (5)." He takes notice, that Hannibal, who had but one Eye, blamed the Painter, who gave him two, and recompensed him who drew him in Profil (6). This shews, that he would not have any Body tell a palpable Lie in his Favour; but was very well pleased with those, who found out the Art of hiding his Imperfections. Vannozzi afterwards hits upon a Latin Precept, which is very fine: "Convien dunque, says he (7), ut veritas ante oculos habeatur, gratia, aique odiis posthabitis; melius est enim Historicum, & Politicum, si non fert ratio temporum, ab Historia scribenda abstinere, quam eam turpiter mentiendo, & adulando, quod plerisque fecisse Flavius Vopiscus scripsit, maculare. Republice enim interest, nequid omnino nisi quod fit compertum & exploratum in lucem exeat, &c." This means, that, if the Times will not allow of speaking the Truth, it is better to forbear writing Histories, than to tell Lies; for the Public is concerned, that whatever is printed be true. He concludes with another Rule; To praise but little, and to blame still less. Seniamo la Lettera, says he (8), con quel moralissimo Detto: Lauda parca, & vituperà parcius. This was well worth a Digression; which I submit to the Judgment of all discerning Men.

[C] Some say the Turks never had any Advantage over him.] Let us hear Strada. "Militari scientiâ clarum quem è Farnesiana Scholâ supremum Cæsaris exercitus Ducem vidimus in Pannoniâ ex Ottomanicis copiis perpetuò victorem (9). — Famous for his military Knowledge, who, from the Duke of Parma's School, became chief General of the Imperial Army, and was always victorious over the Ottoman Forces in Pannonia."

[D] He is an Author.] His Maestro di Campo generale, was printed at Venice, in the Year 1606, and his Governo della Cavalleria leggiera, at Frankfurt, in 1612.

[E] And in very great Esteem.] See here what Naudæus says of him in his Treatise of Military Study; "In equestri militiæ disciplina quatuor seu duces seu tribuni communiter proponuntur, quorum de ea re lucubrations tanquam absolutissimæ omnium sibi calculos & approbationem conciliarunt; scilicet Georgius Basta qui summus mandatorum curator in Belgico Regis exercitu, & Cæsarianarum deinde copiarum ductor summo cum imperio fuit. — In the Military Discipline of the Country, four whose Lucubrations on this Subject are universally approved, and esteemed the most complete; namely, George Basta, who was Commissary general in the King's Army in Flanders, and afterwards Generalissimo of the Imperial Forces." The three others are Ludovicus Melzius, Flaminius à Cruce, and Johannes Jacobus Walhaufius.

BATHYLLUS, a young Man of Samos, passionately beloved by Anacreon, who mentioned him often in his Verses [A]. Among the remaining Odes, which we have of that Poet, there is one (a), wherein he draws the Picture this beautiful Youth.

19th.

[A] Anacreon ----- mentioned him often in his Verses.] Horace observes it: These are his Words,

*Thus for Bathyllus did Anacreon burn,
And in loose Verse his amorous Passion mourn.*

Andrew Schottus shews an unaccountable piece of Madnes in quoting these Verses of Horace, to prove that Mæcenas loved the Pantomime Bathyllus, of whom I shall speak hereafter (2). Charles Stephens was not less mistaken, when he said, that Bathyllus, the Darling of Anacreon, is the same with the Pantomimus, mentioned in these Words of Juvenal, multis salutate Bathyllo (3). Is not this as much as to say, that Juvenal and Anacreon were Cotemporaries?

[B] Poly-

Youth. His Description is not confined, like those of our Romances, to the visible parts; but extends also to those concealed; which is the reason that Madam le Fevre could not fill up all the places of her Translation, but was forced to leave whole Lines with Afterisms. This same Bathyllus had been loved by Polycrates, Tyrant of Samos, who caused a Statue to be erected to him [B], in the Attitude of a Man singing, and playing on the Lyre. Chabot was mistaken in calling him Pantomimus [C]. Mr le Fevre, in endeavouring to excuse Anacreon's dissolute Life, has published some things, which were not very well known [D].

[B] Polycrates ----- who caused a Statue to be erected to him. Some think, that Juvenal speaks of it, when, addressing himself to the Gods, he says, ut video, nullum discrimen habendum est

Effigies inter vestras, statuamque Bathylli (4).

Bathyllus' Statue at this rate may prove Thy equal Rival, or a greater Jove.

Others read Vagelli, instead of Bathylli. That Statue of Bathyllus was in the Temple of Juno, at Samos, before the Altar. Apuleius has given a very particular Description of it (5).

[C] Chabot is mistaken, in calling him Pantomimus. Hic Bathyllus, says he (6), Samius fuit Pantomimus Anacreonti in maximis deliciis. Very probably his Error proceeds from the Idea he had of another Bathyllus, to whom the Title of Pantomimus very well agrees, as shall be seen hereafter.

[D] Mr le Fevre, in endeavouring to excuse Anacreon's dissolute Life, has published some things, which were not very well known. I will here perform the Promise I made in the Remark [G], of the Article ANACREON. This is the most proper Place for these Things. They would have made That Poet's Article too long; but I shall find room enough in this of Bathyllus. I say, then, that, as Mr le Fevre could not be ignorant, that our Poet's Love for Bathyllus passed for mere Sodomy, and that Polycrates's Jealousy of Smerdis made a great Noise, it is unaccountable how he could say, "We do not read, that Anacreon's Pleasures were Matters of Scandal, nor that his Galleries were ever complained of (7)." What he observes, in another place, is much more reasonable. He says, that more scandalous Passions have been seen in the Auxiliary Troops of France, than Anacreon's Amours. His Latin Description of them is too fine to be translated: "An id potius amet quod patrum nostrorum memoria in copiis Auxiliariis vidit Gal-lia?"

Serica cum Dominam ducebant vincla capellam,
Cui nitidum cornu multo radiabat ab auro,
Et segmentatis splendeant tempora vittis.
Illa rofa & myrto fertisque recentibus ibat
Altum vincla caput, dilectæ concia formæ (8).

"Or would he rather pursue those Amours, which were observed by France among the Auxiliary Forces, in the Memory of our Fathers?"

Their Mistress Goat in silken Cords was led;
Her gilded Horns their Rays of Glory spread;
Her Temples with the finest Ribbons bound,
Her Head with Myrtles, and with Roses crown'd,
Proudly she tript, and scarcely trod the Ground.

This is a Piece of secret History, the Circumstances whereof, it is likely, several Readers will enquire into; a She-Goat, the Mistress of an Italian General, and led in Pomp with the Ornaments of a jointed Baby. It is impossible to carry farther, by the most strained Constructions, the Novimus & qui te transversa tumentibus hircis (9).

We know who did your Business, &c.
And what the Goats observed with leering Eyes.

Mr le Fevre was brought into trouble for This Diffculty: "It is not proper, says he (10), that People should know, that I made the Verses about the Crowned Goat. Your Father, to whom I formerly told the History of the She-Goat, mentioned in the Dedication of Anacreon, and who is not ignorant in what manner I was treated in the Sanhedrim, will tell you my Reasons." Here is something which will facilitate an Enquiry into this Fact.

The Duke de Nemours, having besieged Lyons, in the Year 1562, "was obliged to retire, being forsaken
"by Three thousand Italians, who deserted for want "of being paid at the appointed Time. Their living
"had been so licentious, that the Country People "knew no better Remedy, than to burn all the She-"Goats of the Places, thro' which they passed (11)." I choose rather to quote Varillas, than d'Aubigné, who informs us, "That the Duke of Guise, having "a Mind, that the Duke de Nemours should com"mand at the Siege of Lyons, Tavannes caused the "Army to disband, and disgusted the Italians, by "saying, that he could not lead Men to War, who "forced Children and She-Goats; a thing so well "known in the Country, that the Peasants left not "one She-Goat alive, after their Departure (12)." The same Historian says, that the Baron Des-Adrets, leading his Men to fight against the Count de Suxe, made no other Speech but this, "See there the "Murderers of Women and Children, and the Lovers
"of She-Goats; let us fall on (13)." Doublets d'Aubigné knew this by fresh Tradition, and had read an Historian, who had named the Chiefs of those infamous Soldiers, and who says, that Tavannes, being either little satisfied with the Arrival of the Duke de Nemours, who was to command the Siege, or hoping for no good Success from it, retired into Burgundy; that afterwards the Duke de Nemours "marched directly into Dauphiné, where several Actions were performed (14); but, continues he, the Duke d'Angoulême, complaining of his Pay, retired at that Time, except six Companies, which accompanied Nemours, under the Command of Brancaccio. Those Italian Troops, sent and paid by the Pope, did much harm wherever they passed, and plundered the very Shoes of the poor Lazars they met with, and were, besides, so villainous and detestable in their Lives, that they brought She-Goats along with them to make use of, for their more than brutish Filthiness; which was the Cause that, afterwards, the Peasants killed, and threw into their Layfalls, the She-Goats in all the Places through which they passed." The Author of the History of the remarkable Things which happened in France, from the Year 1547, to the beginning of 1597, relates the same things. "During these Transactions, says he (15), the Sieur de Tavannes came from Burgundy, within three Leagues of Lyons, with a Design to storm the City; but he was too far off, although he had then with him above Five thousand Men, besides Three thousand Italians, in the Pope's Pay, commanded by the Count d'Angoulême (16). These Italians, who were the greatest Pilferers in the World, carried a great many Goats with them, and brutally copulated with the Beasts, &c. (17)." It appears by all these Authors, that this happened in the Year 1562. But here is a Writer, who mentions other Circumstances. "The History of France, says he (18), tells us, That the Duke de Nevers, coming from Italy into France, to assist the King, whose Crown the House of Guise endeavoured to invade, under pretence of Religion, brought from thence Two thousand Goats, covered with Capar-isons of green Velvet, with broad Gold Galleons.
It does not give us room at the same time to doubt, what use these Goats were for; it tells us, that they were Mistresses for him, and all his Officers." That Duke de Nevers, is, without doubt, Lewis de Gonzague, who married Henrietta of Cleves, the fourth of March, 1565. Now we do not read, that he went from Italy into France, with a Body of Troops, in the Year 1562. He was Lieutenant General in the Marquisate of Saluces, and the rest of Piedmont, belonging to France, and he received Orders to draw out those warlike Troops, which were there kept in reserve (19) and having discharged, with the Money the Pope sent him, part of the Pay due to his Soldiers, he drew out of his Government about Thirteen thousand Lyons, entered into Dauphiné, raised the Blockade of Mâcon, besieged and took Mâcon, and went to join the Duke of Anjou, in Champagne (20). See Davila, in the fourth Book of his History (21). One of these two things must be true; either those Goats were seen twice in France, or they were not seen in the Army of Lewis de Gonzague: But however that be, d'Artagnan's Memoirs certainly offend against Chronology; for, in the time of the Duke of Nevers's Expedition, the House of Guise did not attempt to usurp the Throne. The Protestant Historians, who speak of these Goats in the Year 1562, say nothing like it about the Duke of Nevers's Troops, in 1567 (22). Now no Body can be ignorant, that their Silence in this Matter is of great Moment.

BATHYLLUS of Alexandria (a), a Freedman of Mæcenas, and very much beloved by him [A], invented, together with one Pylades, a new way of representing all sorts of Dramatic Pieces in Dances. This Invention was called the Italian Dance (b) [C], and comprehended Tragedy, Comedy, and Satire. Not that it was a mixture of them, but that both these Pantomimes preserved the Character of each kind in the performance of their Play. They differed in this, that Bathyllus excelled in the Comic [D], and Pylades in the Tragic part (c). The Emulation, which prevailed between them, formed two Sects of long continuance: each of them left some Scholars, who endeavoured to make their School famous, and to perpetuate the Name of their Master (d); for the Followers of Bathyllus were called Bathylli, and those of Pylades were called Pylades. Both of them preserved the Methods and Characters of their Masters. The Dances of the latter were grave, and proper to excite the great Passions of Tragedy; and those of the former were merry, and suited with amorous Adventures and comical Subjects. They were such Provocatives to Lust, and gave such irresistible Temptations to the

[A] He was a Freedman of Mæcenas, and much beloved by him.] See the Scholiast of Perfius, on these words of the fifth Satire,

Tres tantum ad numeros Satyri moveare Bathylli, and consider this Passage of the Fifty fourth Chapter of the first Book of Tacitus's Annals: "indulgenti ei ludicro Augustus dum Mæcenati obtemperat effuso "in amore Bathylli. — Augustus encouraged these "Diversions, in compliance to Mæcenas's Fondness "for Bathyllus." Consult Dion also, in the Fifty fourth Book, and Seneca in the Preface to the fifth Book of Controversies.

[B] He and Pylades were Inventors of a new manner of representing Dramatic Pieces in Dances.] Suidas says expressly, that Augustus invented the Dance of the Pantomimes, Pylades, and Bathyllus being the first, who introduced it (1). Every body is sensible, that Suidas means, that Augustus was the first, who authorized, and established, the Invention of those two great Dancers (2). In the Greek of That Author it is βαχχυλλίδης; This fault remains in the Suidas of Æmilii Porcius, though Lipsius had corrected it (3), when he rectified two Passages of Seneca, one of which had, Bathyllus Mæcenate (4), instead of Bathyllus Mæcenatis, and the other, Si Pantomimus effem, Pantillius effem (5), instead of Si Pantomimus effem, Bathyllus effem. Zosimus agrees with Suidas (6): he places, among the Causes of the Destruction of the Roman Empire, the Introduction of the Dances of the Pantomimes under Augustus, which were unknown before, and of which Pylades and Bathyllus were the Authors. Athenæus, where he speaks from himself, names only Bathyllus, but when he quotes Aristonicus, he also mentions Pylades (7). It is true, that, to find this in his Text, we must correct one word of it, as Salmasius has very well done. The Greek runs thus, Τῶτον τὸν Βάθυλλον φησὶν Ἀριστονίκῳ καὶ Πυλάδην, ὃ ἐστὶ καὶ σύγγραμμά περὶ ὀρχήσεως, τὴν ἰταλικὴν ὀρχήσιν συσχεσθαι ἐκ τῆς κομικῆς, &c. (8). We must read Πυλάδην, and translate the words thus, "Aristonicus ait, Bathyllum hunc " & Pyladem qui librum de saltatione scripti, Itali "cam saltationem composuisse esse comica, &c. — they found no fault in these words: Ἐργάζεσθαι περὶ ὀρχήσεως τῆς ἰταλικῆς ἥτις ἐστὶ αὐτῷ ἐνέβη. περὶ τῆς κομικῆς καλεμένης ὀρχήσεως — καὶ τῆς σατυρικῆς. Salmasius pretends, that, instead of περὶ τῆς κομικῆς, it must be read ἀπὸ τῆς κομικῆς, and so on; which signifies, that Pylades wrote a Book concerning the Italian Dance, which he had invented and formed out of the Comic, &c. It is certain, that, by this means, Suidas would say a thing, which Athenæus relates positively. Let the Readers judge whether it might not be true, that Pylades's Book treated in particular of the three ancient Sorts of Dances, and of That, which he had substituted in the Room of those three, which was necessarily different from each of them, though perhaps it retained them all intirely.

[C] ——— which was called the Italian Dance.] I chuse rather to express myself thus; than barely to say, that Pylades and Bathyllus invented the Art of representing a Dramatic Piece by Dancing, and the Action of the Hands. I am not ignorant, that many Authors speak of it as of a thing, which began first under Augustus: for, besides the Authorities quoted in the foregoing Remark, it is certain, that Suidas says, somewhere, That at this time (that is, under This Emperor) the Dance of the Pantomimes was introduced, unknown before, ἢ τῷ πρότερον ἔσα (11). Zonaras also places the Establishment of it under Augustus (12). But, because Salmasius made it appear, that the Custom of acting Dramatic Poetry by the Motion of the Feet and Hands was much antecedent than Bathyllus and Pylades (13), it is better to say, that they only perfected That Art, and practised it after a new Manner. He believes, that, before their Time, the Pantomimes performed their Dances and Gestures while Tragedy or Comedy was representing, and that these two Men were the first, who discharged all the Actors, and introduced Dancing only on the Orchestra (14). I shall observe elsewhere (15) with what new Entertainments Pylades enriched the Art he professed. Lipsius believed himself to be the first, who discovered Augustus to be the Inventor of That Dance (16). This Discovery, as we have seen, is not very fortunate.

[D] Bathyllus excelled in the Comic Part. Athenæus (17), and Plutarch (18), inform us of the difference, which was in this Respect between these two Dancers. It may be very well inferred from these words of Seneca the Father: "Quidam melius equitem "pantiunt, quidam jugum, & ut ad morbum te "meum vocem, Pylades in comœdia, Bathyllus in "tragœdia, multum à se aberant (19). — Some can "best bear a Trooper, some a Yoke, and, to instance in "my own Dissemper, Pylades in Comedy, and Bathyllus in Tragedy, differ widely from each other." The Sequel of the Discourse proves, that the Design is to shew, that a Person is not equally fit for different Parts. But, though each of these Pantomimes had the female Spectators, that I dare not say of them, in my Mother Tongue, what Juvenal did in Latin [E]. The Romans divided themselves into Parties, on account of these two famous Pantomimes, and it seems, that the Friends of Bathyllus had once the Honour of causing Pylades, to be banished (e). The kindness of Mæcenas for Bathyllus may authorize This conjecture, with submission to Macrobius [F]. See what we shall say in the Article of PYLADES. Mention is made of Bathyllus in the eighth Fable of the fifth Book of Pbædrus. The Author of Moreri's Supplement has given a very proper account of This Pantomime; but his Quotations are wrong; for the Citation from Plutarch concerns only a small part of the Article, and That from Lucian has two great Defects; one is, that the Book de Pantomimi Scena, to which the Reader is referred, is a Chimera; the other, that the Treatise de Saltatione, where Lucian has said many things of Pantomimes, does not particularly mention Bathyllus and Pylades. I believe I have discovered the Origin of this wrong Quotation.

had their Excellences and Perfection, as I have observed, yet they both undertook Tragedy and Comedy. Bathyllus was not the only one, who acted Plays, wherein some Persons were to be represented in great Motion, as the Pans, and the Satyrs feasting with Cupid; it appears, that Pylades signified himself by representing a Feast, given by Bacchus to the Bacchantes and Satyrs (20). Vossius, who appropriates such a Subject to Bathyllus (21), had not sufficiently regarded the learned Dissertation of Salmafius.

[E] I dare not say, in my Mother Tongue, what Juvenal did in Latin.] To shew how indecent this would be, see here Juvenal's words in the sixth Satire.

Cheironomon Ledam molli saltante Bathyllo
Tuccia vesicæ non imperat: Apula gannit
Sicut in amplexu: subitum & miserabile longum
Attendit Thymele, Thymele tunc rufica difcitt.

One sees a dancing Master cap'ring high,
And raves and pisses with pure Extasy:
Another does with all his Motions move,
And gapes and grins, as in the Feat of Love:
A third is charmed with the new Opera Notes,
Admires the Song, but on the Singer dotes:
The Country Lady in the Box appears,
Softly she warbles over all she hears;
And sucks in Passion, both at Eyes and Ears.

DRYDEN.

Father Tarteron, the Jesuit, suppressed this Latin in his new Edition of Juvenal (22), which he translated into French. He also suppressed some other Passages, for the Reasons, which he alleges in his Preface. Thus much by the by.

[F] It seems the Friends of Bathyllus - - - - - caused Pylades to be banished: The Interest of Bathyllus

may authorize This Conjecture, with Submission to Macrobius.] He says, that Pylades incurred Augustus's Indignation, because the Dispute between him and Hylas, who had been his Scholar, had raised a Sedition among the People. The answer ascribed to Pylades by Macrobius, Sir, you are ungrateful, let them concern themselves with our Quarrel (23), is the same with That mentioned by Dion, who reports, that this Pantomime, being recalled from his Exile, and reproved by Augustus for his Quarrels with Bathyllus, made answer, It is to your Advantage, Cæsar, that we amuse the People, and binder them from giving attention to other matters. Συμψέρεται σοι, Καίσαρ, περὶ ἡμῶν τὸν δῆμον ἀποδιὰ τριπύρεσθαι (24). Expediit tibi, Cæsar, populum nobis tempus consumere. Let who will take Macrobius's Part against Dion: as to myself, I prefer the latter; and I think it most probable, that it was not in Hylas's, but in Bathyllus's Favour, that the Emperor was angry with Pylades. In the Article of the latter, we shall see the Opposition between Dion and Suetonius.

[G] The Supplement of Moreri makes a wrong Quotation concerning Bathyllus. - - - - - I believe I have discovered the Origin of it.] Salmafius quotes Lucian several times, who wrote a fine Treatise of Dancing. Among other Passages, he quotes That, which contains the Description of the Equipage of a Pantomime, if I may be allowed the Liberty of That Word, to express all the Instruments made use of in Dancing. Now, before he quotes those of Lucian, he has these words, Lucianus de Pantomimi Scenâ & apparatu: By which, he does not mean to denote the Title of a Book, but only the Matter of a certain Passage he is going to quote. However, Mr Hofman was deceived by it; for, after having mentioned part of what relates to Pylades, in the Book of Salmafius, he refers us to Lucian de Pantomimi Scenâ & appar. and, as he puts these words in Italic, it is not to be questioned but this proved a Trap, into which the Continuator of Moreri fell headlong.

BATHYLLUS, a Latin Poet, cotemporary with Virgil. See, in the Supplement of Moreri's Dictionary, what is recorded of him. We have only to add this Circumstance to it, that the second Paper, Virgil caused to be posted up, began with the Distich, which Bathyllus had appropriated to himself, and that the next words were, Hos ego versiculos feci, &c. Giraldus, who is a Modern Author, ought not to have been quoted, but Virgil's life by Donatus. I cannot tell where Charles Stephens found his Bathyllus, an excellent Tragic Poet, who did not succeed so well in Comedies.

BAUDERON (BRICE), a French Physician, born at Parei, in the Country of Charolois, flourished towards the end of the XVIth, and beginning of the XVIIth Century. He applied himself with great success to the Composition of Medicines, and published a Pharmacopœia [A], which has acquired a very great Authority.

[A] He published a Pharmacopœia.] It was printed several times. John de Renou has observed, that the second Edition is of Lyons, by Bennet Rigaud, in 1596; and that the third is of Lyons, by Peter Rigaud, in 1603 (1). He says also, that he had seen, in the third, the Fault he had censured. Note, he makes this Remark, in a Book, printed in the Year 1623, wherein he answers a Complaint of the Son of Bauderon, and exhorts him to be "more diligent another "time, in examining and correcting more particularly the Writings of his Father; in order to render them more clear and intelligible to those of his Profession, instead of confounding and making them more obscure (2)." From hence we may infer two Things: one, that our Bauderon was not living in 1623; the other, that his Pharmacopœia had been published with Additions by his Son. It was translated into Latin, by an Englishman, whose Name

BAUDIUS (DOMINIC), Professor of History in the University of Leyden, was born at Lisse the eighth of April 1561. He began his Studies at Aix la Chapelle. His Father retired thither with his Family during the Cruelties of the Duke d'Alba, and died there in the Year 1576. A little time after, Baudius went to continue his Studies at Leyden, where he staid but eight Months, and went afterwards to Ghent, whither his Mother had retired, and from whence she sent him to Geneva, where he studied Divinity, and performed all the Exercises of a Student in that Science. In the Year 1583, he returned to Ghent, where he continued his Studies of Divinity under Lambert Daneau; then he went to Leyden, where, having applied himself fifteen Months to the study of the Civil Law, he was made Doctor of Law in June 1585. Some days after, he followed the Ambassadors, which the States General sent into England, and became acquainted with several Persons of Note, and particularly with the famous Sir Philip Sidney. He was admitted one of the Advocates of the Hague the fifth of January 1587, and, being very soon weary of the Bar [A], he went to travel into France [B], where he continued ten Years [C]. He found good Friends, and great Patrons, there: Achilles de Harlai, first President in the Parliament of Paris, was one of the latter, and caused him to be admitted an Advocate in the Parliament in the Year 1592 (a). In 1602, Baudius went into England, with Christopher de Harlai, whom Henry the Great,

[H] He was soon weary of the Bar.] Being a Walloon, he could not speak Dutch well enough to plead with Success; besides he stood in need of an Employ, which would furnish him with ready Money, and That is not to be expected from the Profession of an Advocate, till after many Years. Add to this, that he a little fed himself with the Vain hopes of Court Preferment; and lastly, that he was born a Poet, which, of all things in the World, gives the least relish for the knotty Subtilties of the Bar. See the Advice Lipsius gives him to persevere with Patience (1).

[B] He went to travel into France.] He had a good Opinion of himself, and fancied, that he might obtain a public Character to travel honourably. He imagined, that the States would send him to the King of Navarre, if his Friends should request it of them. He communicated his Thoughts to Lipsius, who was then Professor in the University of Holland: The Answer, which he received from him, taught him handsomely to know himself better. "Prioribus (literis) agebas de legatiuncula ad Navarrenum: quo fundamento, mi Baudi, aut qua spe? Nunquam id factum, & ut in tua persona novum exemplum Ordines instituant, cave credas. Tu hoc & alia mereris, sed male res humanas nosti, si merita in his talibus appendis potius quam fortunam. ----- Hoc unum te moneo ne precipitem te tuorum vota, pia, sed improvida, qui ad lapsum saepe impellunt dum cogunt festinare. Ne sperne honores, sed nec avide appetite, qui eo minore te putant quia cares, tu eos habes pro minutis (2). — You mention, in your former Letters, that Deputation to the King of Navarre, but on what Foundation, my Friends, and with what Hopes?

"There has not been hitherto any Instance of such a Deputation, and I would not have you think the States will now begin to appoint one in your Favour. You deserve indeed this, and a great deal more, but you are little acquainted with the World, if you think Fortune has not a greater Share in these Things than Merit. ----- One thing I would advise you, not to give too much ear to the Persuasions of Friends, which though well intended are yet unseasonable, and who, by spurring on too fast, are often the Occasion of a Fall. Neither despise Honours, nor court them too eagerly: And, if any think the worse of you, for not being possessed of them, you ought to think as meanly of them." This is a very wise Answer; Seneca could say nothing more judicious. Baudius was never the better for this good Advice: We shall see, in the Remark [C], that he continued all his Lifetime infatuated with Deputations and Embassies.

[C] ----- where he continued ten Years.] He testifies, in some of his Letters, that he designed to end his Days there, provided he could meet with a tolerable Maintenance. "Ægrè enim ægrè Galliam desero, nec deseram, nisi desertus ab omni sociis (3). ----- Ego hic aut alibi in hoc regno sedem exilii circumspicio: ignoscant mihi genii patriæ, plane non teneor revertendi desiderio (4). ----- I have no Thought of leaving France, nor will I leave it, unless all manner of Hope first leaves me. ----- I will either here, or in some other part of this Kingdom, find out a Place of Exile; my Country must pardon me, for I have indeed not the least Desire of returning." Great sent thither Ambassador (b). This Christopher was the only Son of the first President. At last Baudius settled at Leyden, being made Professor of Eloquence there in May 1602. After the Death of Merula, he read Lectures on History: and was allowed to do the same on the Civil Law. In the Year 1611, the States divided the Office of their Historiographer between him and Meursius (c), and, in consequence thereof, he wrote the History of the Truce (d). That Work is well penned. Baudius's Style was very polite, as appears by his Letters. His Friends published a great Number of them after his Death, and, from time to time, others have been added to them in the new Editions. He was a great Latin Poet [D]: the Verses we have of his leave no room to doubt it. He composed several kinds of them, and in great Numbers: and they have born many Editions.

this as the strongest; That he could not leave France, while he hoped for any Thing there. "Nos qui via non pervulgata ad bonam mentem adspiramus non magis illic ad res tractandas idonei censetur quam ἄνθρωποι λύπης; vultures togati omnia virtutis præmia possident bonis de præsidio dejectis, vel (quod deterius est) viri Mercuaries, quibus quam bene conveniat cum genere literarum dicimus magno nostro malo. Denique (quæ ratio maxima est) non possumus vobis divelli quamdiu speculæ locum videro (5). ----- We ----- who quit the common Road, in our Search of Goodness, are esteemed there as unfit for Business, as an Ass to be a Musician; The Vultures of the long Robe are in Possession of all the Rewards of Virtue, in exclusion of the Good, or (which is worse) The Men of Business and Traffic; whose Disposition towards Men of Letters I know by sad Experience. Lastly, (which is the strongest Motive), I cannot be torn from you, whilst I have the least Hope remaining." He was too happy to return into a Country, which he spoke so ill of. He desired Thuanus to get him into the Family of the Prince of Dombes (6); and I believe he made the same Request to Scaliger (7). He was recommended to a worthy Gentleman, who, besides his Diet, allowed him Eight hundred Livres a Year (8), and, by that means, he found an Opportunity to insinuate himself into the Acquaintance of all the most illustrious Persons in the Parliament of Paris, which was then sitting at Tours. He wrote, from Caën, to Thuanus, that he was about a Work like That of George Casander (9). I cannot say, whether any Body ever placed Baudius among the Reconcilers of Religion. He endeavoured to cause Lipsius to be invited to Paris, and was very much vexed, that this Affair was neglected; for he found a great Disappointment in it. He desired to see his Native Country again, without being at the Expence of the Journey, and in such a manner as might do him Honour, and afford him a Pretence to give himself some Airs: He hoped to be deputed to fetch Lipsius: Was there not reason enough to be vexed that they should be so backward at Paris to send for That great Man? "Lipsio equidem omnia summa cupio, & ob honorem hominis, & ob amorem literarum. Sed tamen mei potissimum commodi ratio à me ducebatur, cum tam ambitionis flagitationibus hoc agebam, ut huc evocaretur. Sua debet enim voluntas, & rerum meorum status urgebat, ut in patriam excurrerem: quod ut sine sumptu meo & cum nonnulla dignitate fieret, bella occasio evenisse videbatur, si quod spe ac votis præceperam, publico nomine ad eum accerendum Legatus forem (10)." When he wrote this to Thuanus, his Affairs were in a bad Condition (11); he kept in the Country, because his Purse was too low to maintain him in Paris. The following Letter (12) to the same, was wrote in Prison: He says, That no Body would be bail for him, and That, without it, Mr. Servin's good Office, at whose Recommendation the Judges had been favourable to him, would be intirely useless. In 1597, he was at Paris, full of too presumptuous Pretensions. The Envoy of the United Provinces was so ill, that it was thought he could not recover. Baudius, flattering himself with the Thoughts of succeeding him, wrote immediately to Scaliger, and desired his Assistance to procure him the Character of Envoy of the States General to Henry IV (13). Scaliger returned him almost the same Answer that Lipsius had done about ten Years before (14). In the Year 1598, Baudius wrote to the two Envoys of Holland, at the Court of France, most humbly beseeching them to procure him some Employment in his Country's Service (15). In the Month of July, of the same Year, he was in Prison for bailing another inconsiderately. In carcerem conjectus sum nullum ob flagitium, sed ob inconsumulam spondendi temeritatem (16). In the Year 1602, he went into England, with Christopher de Harlai, as his Secretary and Counsellor, and as a learned Man. Profectus sum in Angliam ut ei sim à consiliis, à secretis, ab interioribus studiis (17). The same Year he went into Holland, where he was made Professor. This is all his Letters have informed me of concerning his Abode in France. He thought himself so fit for an Embassy, and had so strong an Inclination this way, that his Professorship at Leyden could not cure him of That Passion. Above all, he would fain have been appointed to congratulate Henry IV, in the Name of the States General, upon the Report, that This Prince had been elected King of the Romans (18). "Si qua occasio aperiretur, ut extra ordinem publico nomine in Galliam legari possem, multum felicitati meæ gratularer. Sed hæc ægri somnia sunt, ut & rumor ille qui pervagatur de Gallo designato Rege Romanorum. Quid fit tamen ita esset, cum inquit in incredibili sæpe veritas, & in verisimili mendaciam, non disconveniret magnificentie Illustrissimorum Ordinum, mitti qui publicam lætitiâ secunda Oratione testarentur (19). ----- I should think myself very happy, if I could meet with an Opportunity of being sent Ambassador Extraordinary into France. But these are only a sick man's Dreams, as well as the Report of the French King being elected King of the Romans. But, if it should be so, as we sometimes find incredible things to be true, and probable things to be false, it would not be unbecoming the Magnificence of the High and Mighty States to testify the public Joy on this Occasion by a complimenting Embassy." In the Year 1607, he went into England to present his Poems to King James, and he had a great Notion of getting himself to be deputed to That Prince by the States General. For this Purpose he desired Mr. Vander Myle, Barnevelt's Son-in-law, to recommend him to his Father-in-law; and did not question but that Barnevelt would invent some Pretence for this Deputation. But, not succeeding in this, Baudius was resolved to pursue his Design at all Events, and so undertook That Journey with no other Character than That of his own Deputy. "Si amplissimi Ordines aliquid huic mortali mandare dignarentur quod nostra vox deferret ad aures Regis, forte nihil amitterent ejus eos ponere posset, & mihi tum gaudium tum honoris esset reip. causa legari, nec Baudii negotium omittre. ----- (20) Sin frustra mecum hæc blanda somnia mediocriter ibo à me legatus (21). ----- If the illustrious States would vouchsafe to charge me with a Compliment to the King, perhaps they would do nothing they need be ashamed of, and it would be both a Pleasure and an Honour to me, to represent the Republic, and, at the same time, not to neglect my own private Affairs. ----- But, if I only flatter myself with vain Hopes, I will go my own Ambassador." [D] He was a great Latin Poet. See the Judgment Borricius (22) and Morbofius (23) pass on his Poems. The first Edition is not of the Year 1607 (24), but of the Year 1587: He dedicated it to Peter Regemorterus. This Epistle dedicatory is the second of Baudius's Letters. He had published a Book of Iambics, by itself, dedicated to the Cardinal de Bourbon (25). He dedicated some of his Poems to the King of England, and some others to the Prince of Wales, in the Edition of the Year 1607, and he went over Sea to make his Present to his two Patrons. He had the cruel Mortification to return Home without receiving the Value of a Farthing from those

He died at Leyden, the Twenty second of August 1613 (e). He had some mortifications in the latter Years of his Life [E]. He was none of those warlike Doctors in those two Princes; all he gained, by That Journey, was to become their Creditor, which was not worth his Expenses. Here follow his Grievances and Complaints (26). "Arbitror te ex indicio famæ factum esse certiores, me superiori mense Augusto transfretasse in magnam Britanniam, cujus & Monarchæ de manu in manum tradidi Salisberiæ Poëmata mea, quorum minus malum carmen heroicum ejus honori inscribitur. Duo vero Gnomarum Iambicarum libri dedicati sunt Principi Britanniarum, quicum horam amplius unam familiariter sum collocutus. Sed hac fine stetit omnis regia liberalitas, nec teruncio factus sum propensior, ut vel meo exemplo liquere possit, magnos terrarum dominos posse perdere, non donare. Interim non penitet suscepti itineris, nisi quod te non offenderim. Nam & habeo reges debendi reos, & olim fors fuit intelliget

"----- I suppose you have heard, that, in August last, I crossed the Sea into Great Britain, to whose King I presented my Poems, at Salisbury, with my own Hand, the most tolerable Copy of Heroics being inscribed to him. The two Books of moral Sentences, in Iambics, were dedicated to the Prince of Wales, with whom I had the Honour of above an Hour's familiar Conversation. But the Royal Generosity reached no farther, nor was I one Brass Farthing the better for it, so true is it, from my Example, that great Princes can ruin, instead of rewarding. However, I do not, in the least, repent of my Journey, except only in not meeting with you. For I have now those Princes in my Debt, and perhaps they will some time or other remember

[E] He had some Mortifications in the latter Years of his Life] He was obliged to solicit a long time for an Augmentation of his Salary, though they could not be ignorant of the grievous Persecutions he suffered from his Creditors. He desired only to be admitted into the Sect of the Millenarians, that is, that his Salary might be raised to a thousand Guilders (27), which was hardly granted him, after many mean Solicitations, when Scaliger's Pension was divided among several other Professors. "Multis collegarum aucta sunt stipendia, quo nomine illis gratulor non invidio: sane omnes videntur quasi sacro agmine concurrere ad cernendam hæreditatem & legenda spolia

"maximi virorum Josephi Scaligeri (28). Læsus esse videor quod præteritis committi nulla sit habita Baudii ratio nec in augendo peculio, nec in causâ ordinariatus, quum tamen multi collegarum etiam plura obtinuerint quàm auri erant sperare (29). ----- Many of my Colleagues have had their Stipends augmented, for which I congratulate, and not envy, them: Indeed they seem to have stuck together on Purpose to enter upon the Inheritance, and divide the Spoil of the greatest of Men, Joseph Scaliger. I think I have been very ill used, in not being taken notice of by the last Assembly either as to increasing my Salary, or making mine a Professorship in Ordinary, when several of my Colleagues have obtained even more than they could expect." Nay, at that very time, poor Baudius was the last, who was thought of, though he alleged, that he had contributed as much as any Body to That great Man's coming into Holland (30). At last his Stipend was raised, but they forgot his repeated Instances on another Account: he was left Professor extraordinary, though he had solicited a long time for a Place among the ordinary Professors, that he might enjoy the right of Suffrage in the Assemblies of the University, without which he could not have any share in the Perquisites arising from Promotions. "Intellexi hesternâ die ex sermone nostrî Heinsii herois, habitam esse Baudii rationem in supplemento peculii. Quo nomine plurimum me Collegio Curatorum, in primis autem benevolentia

"tuz debere confiteor. Sed si eadem opera in ordinem redacta essent, nulla ex parte beneficium claudicaret. Nisi forte honorificentius est quod extra ordinem nobis ob sedulam in publico munere obeundo curam ac diligentiam præmium sit decretum, quam si adscriptus esset manipulo Ordinariorum. Mihi quidem judicium bonorum & optime voluntatis conscientia potior est omni prærogativa sententiæ dicendæ: tamen aliquid dandum est famæ, & publico hominum errori (31). ----- I understood yesterday, from the Discourse of our great Heinsius, that some Regard has been had to the augmenting my Salary. On which Account I own myself very much obliged to the College of Curators, but must of all to your particular Kindness. If by the same means I could have been ranked among the ordinary Professors, the Favour would have been perfect in every Respect. Unless it be thought more honourable to decree me an additional Reward as Professor extraordinary, on account of my great Care and Diligence in the Discharge of my Office, than if I had been listed among those in ordinary." Baudius was not grown the wiser for Lipsius's Advice. "I value the Esteem of good Men, says he, and the Testimony of my Conscience, more than the Privilege of giving my Voice: but some Regard must be had to Fame, and popular Error." Thus Men love to flatter themselves, and deceive the Public: They would enjoy Honours, and the glory of despising them, at the same time. "It is not, that we ourselves value, say they, such a Degree of Honour, or such a Prerogative, which makes us solicit for it; but, because the Vulgar will despise us, if we cannot obtain it." But what had Lipsius said to Baudius?

"Look on those as the lowest sort of People, who shall despise you, because they do not see Fortune favour you." If Baudius had made use of this

wife Maxim, would he have said, that some Regard must be had to popular Opinions? To leave this moral Digression, our Professor attained the Right of voting before his Death: He was ranked, at last, in the Class of Professors in ordinary (32); but, by the Maxim, Turpius ejicitur quam non admittitur hopes, it had been better for him, if he had not been received into it; for he was degraded from it; and because, during That Suspension, he had taken Place of a Professor in ordinary at a Funeral, he was severely reprimanded in a full Academical Council, where he was cited to appear for several other Reasons (33). I say nothing of the Injunction he received, not to pronounce the Speech he had prepared against the Scholars of Leyden, who had, in a seditious Manner, committed many Disorders (34). He was also forbid to publish it. But it was published afterwards, and is a very good Piece. I have not hinted, that they took from him the Professorship of the Civil Law (35), and that the Academical Council declared to him, on his Admission into the Body of the ordinary Professors, that he should take Place last of all (36). He would not submit to That Sentence, but alleged his common Topic again, that some Regard ought to be had to the Errors of the People. "Fortiter contemno & Stoica firmitate contemno ineptias illas & concertationes de loco, quum ad rectam rationem & ad serium ac severum judicium rem exigo. Sed obsecundandum est populo & scenæ, cujus calculo magni sæpe viri ex ejusmodi inanibus vel æstimantur vel deprestantur (37). ----- I heartily despise, and, with the Firmness of a Stoic, am intirely unconcerned at those Follies and Contentions about Place, upon a trivial and serious Consideration of the Matter according to right Reason. But we must suit ourselves to the present Taste and Times, according to which these Trifles have very often a great Share in advancing or blasting the Characters of Great Men." This is down right declaring, that he did not regulate his Conduct by right Reason, duly considered, but by popular Follies, duly considered. Let us pass to other Matters: his ill Husbandry made him fall into Poverty, and under the Hands of his Creditors, so as to occasion, in his Person, some Disgrace to the University: For he was put under Guardianship, as incapable of the Administration of his Estate. "Ut liberer ab impein the Cabinet, who will neither have Peace nor Truce, and who treat, as ill affected to their Country, all those, who do not reject the Offers and Offices of the Mediators of Peace, as a dangerous Poison, and a fatal Snare. He earnestly exhorted the States to make a Truce with Spain. It is true he durst not put his Name to the two Speeches he published on that Subject (f). It is also true, that those two Speeches [F], and the Verses he made upon Spinola, excited great murmurings [G]. This pacific humour only regarded the State; for he was otherwise no Enemy to Poetical Quarrels: he maintained them with so much violence, that I do not believe, that the most famous Heathen Poets, for the bitterness of their Invectives, such as Archilochus, and Hipponax, could ever heap up more abuses, or make a more exquisite choice of vilifying Expressions. He principally employed them against the declared Enemies of the great Scaliger. They could not bear any Contradiction, and the most Cunning Man would have found it a very difficult thing to stop their Mouths. So that there was a reciprocal Shooting, and alternate

But this is a very public Disgrace, to be debarred the Administration of my own Affairs, in a Nation of Liberty, as if I had lost my Senses." We shall mention hereafter his keeping a Mistress, which made him the Jest of all the Country. In a Word, this poor Man went through so many Vexations, that he says, in one of his Letters (39), he would have put an end to his Life, if God had not ordered us to keep our Station here, 'till he calls us from it. His Courage and drinking kept him up. He was not surprized, when the Faction of his Colleagues threatened to expel him from the Chair of the Civil Law, or to oblige him to Silence by the great Noise the Scholars should make (40). Was it not better to live like a Hermit, than with such Colleagues?

(39) It is the 19th of the 17th Century. P. 496.

(40) Epist. 48. Cent. III. p. 408, 411.

[F] The two Speeches, be made on the Peace, excited great Murmurings.] We should rather say, they had like to have ruined him; for Prince Maurice was made to believe, that he was abused in it, and a Report was spread, that the Ambassador of France had bribed the Author, with a good Sum of Money, to write concerning the Truce. Baudius was obliged to write both to the Prince, and his Secretary, in his own Justification; and to deplore his ill Fortune for exposing him to a Crowd of malicious Calumniators, or false Interpreters of his Words (41). "Suppose, said he, I have not had a sufficient Knowledge of every particular Fact, to be able to advise what is most expedient for our Country; does it therefore follow, that I must appear to have acted like an ill Subject in freely speaking my Sentiments in such a Republic as ours?" "Quod si per imprudentiam factum est, ut à recte suadendo mens aberraverit, quandoquidem pleraque τῶν καθ' ἑκαστά me latent, circa quorum cognitionem recti consilii norma gubernari non potest: saltem nihil fecisse arbitror præter officium boni civis, si in regno ac domicilio libertatis, quæ sub ejus præsidio secura conquiescit, ausus sum uti felicitate temporum, quibus & sentire quæ velis, & quæ sentias sidenter effari liceat (42)." In all Countries, there are but too many Persons, who think no Body can differ from them on State Affairs, without being bribed by the Enemies of their Country. There are others of better Understanding, who know very well, that a Man may have a great Zeal for the Public Good, and, at the same time, be of an Opinion quite contrary to theirs; but yet make People believe, that such an Opinion favours of Treason: they must do it to make others afraid to contradict them. Whether it proceeds from the Jealousy of the Ignorant, who think, that there is no right way but their own (43), or from the Art of cunning Men, who make others believe what they do not believe themselves, a Man is equally to be pitied, when he finds himself exposed, as Baudius was, to the Fury of Slanderers. "Illud in universum obtinet, says he, vitio humanæ malignitatis, ut nihil tam commodè dicatur à viris alicujus famæ & eximiationis quin læva interpretatione depravari possit. Quid porro absurdius eo genere hominum qui me rumoribus distulerunt, quasi redemptus essem pretio ab amplissimo Præside & Legato Jeanninio ut scilicet inanes logos pro insigni liberalitate rependerem, & succenturiarer doctorem umbraticum viro in summis rebus trito ac subactò (44)? It is universally true, such is the Malice of Mankind, that the best Thing which can be said by Men of Character and Reputation is liable to Misconstruction. But what can be more absurd, than the loading me with this Calumny, as if I had been bribed by the illustrious President, and the French Ambassador, in order, it seems, to repay them empty Words for their great Liberality, and for me, who am only an obscure Doctor, to be added as an Assistant to one, who has been so thoroughly versed and employed in the greatest Affairs?"

(44) Epist. 3. Cent. III. pag. 319. See also pag. 321.

[G] And the Verses which he made for Spinola.] The Marquis of Spinola went into Holland before there was any thing concluded, either about a Peace or Truce. Baudius printed a Poem in Praise of That Marquis; but he suppressed the Copies of it, 'till the Business, which brought him thither, should more plainly appear. He only gave some of them to his most intimate Friends. "Mitto tibi exemplum carminis quo gratulatus sum Marchioni Spinolæ, quum in hanc regionem illius ergo adveniret. Curavi, ut vides, illud typis excudendum. Sed ex consilio amicorum hæcenus asservavi intra penetralia Vestæ, nec communicavi nisi cum paucissimis intimæ admissionis. Certe non est visum consultum, ut ipsi traderetur. Non quod illi quidquam sit indignum constanti vero vel bono cive: sed quia non videtur, &c. (45). But yet it was known, that this Poem was printed; and the Author was like to have been banished for it. He escaped that Punishment, only because there were some equitable Persons among those, who examined that Piece of Poetry. Pene mihi stetit exilio hæc editionis festinatæ temeritas, nisi senior pars inspecta carmine me omni culpa liberasset (46). A great many others would have pronounced, that no Body could praise That Marquis, without being a Traitor to the State, and a Pensioner of the Court of Spain. Prævo & sinistro ingenio nati sunt qui crimen & pene perduellionis scelus putant, si quis assurgere audeat in laudem hostis. Tales multos alit hæc ætas, & quidem inter eos sunt qui sedent ad clavum reip. sub quorum maxillis edendum (47). They would, at least, have appeared, outwardly, of Opinion, that whoever does not speak, or write, according to their Inclinations, and prejudiced Notions, must necessarily be a Traitor: And this it is not to consider, that Reason has different Faces, and does not appear in the same Light to all sorts of Understandings. There were even particular Excuses for Baudius: He was a good Poet, and could not avoid thinking on all remarkable Subjects; the Marquis of Spinola's coming into Holland, was a Subject of that Nature: it was, therefore, very possible, that Baudius made Verses on that Marquis, only to exercise his Muse on a noble Matter, without any ill Thoughts against the State. This was not only very possible, but also very probable. Besides, the Expectation of some Pistoles, as a Reward for some Verses, is very consistent with the most perfect Loyalty. The worst that could be said of him, was, that he alternate Broadfides, between the University of Leyden, and the College of Antwerp [H]. I have not found, that Baudius makes any mention of his Children; but I know that he left his last Wife big with Child (g), and that he was at least twice married [I], and that this was not the most unexceptionable part of his Life. Wine

he had not the Zeal of the Times, that is, such a Temper of Mind as to take Fire, and startle at the very hearing the Word Spaniard. He kept his Affections cool, and wished well to the Public calmly, and without Passion, and only according to Reason. "Ego tamen si lentum hoc negotium sperato pacis eventu concludetur, ut ex intimis sensibus voveo, non dubitavo virum (Marckionem Spinolam) affari, & quicquid hujus est muneris meque omnem ipsi offerre, salvo jure patrie libertatis (48). — But if this tedious Treaty ends in a Peace, as I heartily wish it may, I shall make no Scruple to apply to him, (the Marquis Spinola,) and offer all the Service I am capable of, consistently with the Liberty of my Country." But the Public has occasion for quite another Disposition, That of an artificial and blind Hatred. Discourses, which feed this Passion, are at least Appearances of Maxims of State, Arcanorum Imperii.

[H] There was a reciprocal Storm, and an alternate Assault, between the University of Leyden, and the College of Antwerp.] See the Book entitled, Væ Viçiti, lusus Rhetorum aduocatorum adversus Leydenfes eruaticas, munerario Godefrido Vrancken. It is the true Name of a Jesuit, mentioned by Alagambus (49); and yet he ascribes the Væ Viçiti to the Jesuit Maximilian Habbeque (50). It was printed in the Year 1609. There is mention made in it of a Writing, which I have not seen, published, the Year before, by the Jesuits of Antwerp, against one Schlaßius. It would require a long List, to give the Titles of all the Pieces, printed at that Time, in the Spanish Netherlands, against the Professors of Leyden, and in Holland, against the Jesuits. Baudius was one of those, whom the Jesuits attacked after the most cruel Manner: He is terribly lashed in the Væ Viçiti. Scribamini did not spare him in the Year 1607, in his Domini Baudii Gnomæ Commentario illustratæ. Baudius did not deny, but that he had wrote too passionately against the Jesuits, and seemed to be troubled for it; he hoped also, that Persons of Candor would not take rigorously, what he had only expressed according to poetical Licence. Here is what he wrote to Sueretius (51): "Utinam rebus integris, te monitore & consiliario effem usus! liber nossem, si non melior, saltem securior & latoribus auspiciis exisset in lucem. Multaque nimis licenter effusa, vel privati laribus inclusissem ne temere erumperent, vel, quod tuisissimæ cautionis genus est, tardipedi deo commissem. Nunc post culpam admittam serio ringor, verum haud gravate veniam impetraturus confido apud elegantioris notæ judices & benignos rerum æstimatores, qui non abrepti præjudicii aut partium studiis, in causæ cognitione diligenter expendant, quantum publicis legibus ac moribus licentiz Poëtarum concedatur. — Ante omnia & vellem & fuerat melius, non tetigissem unctos. Nec prudentissimo consilio factum esse confiteor, quod tela strinxerim in universam Soteriorum sodalitatem. Sunt enim ex iis multi, quos ob doctrinam & virtutis ac probitatis indolem revereor atque observo. — I wish I had asked your Advice, before I had taken one Step. My Book, if not with Improvements, would, at least, have been published with greater Pleasure and Security. Many things, too freely touched, would either have been kept still private, or, which is the safest Way, committed to the Flames. I now heartily repent of my Fault, but hope to meet with no small Favour from Judges of the highest Rank, who estimate things fairly, and without being influenced by Prejudice or Party, will carefully consider, what Allowances our Laws and Customs always make to poetical Licence. — Above all I wish, and it had better, I never had meddled with the Jesuits. Nor was it prudent to attack their whole Society. For there are a great many of them, whom, for their Learning, Virtue, and Probity, I reverence and esteem." In another Letter, wherein he owns, that his Stile was too passionate, he hopes, that the Rage, which his Enemies express against him, will excuse him with equitable Persons. He goes on, and says, "I have just

"now read a Book, published against me, which is altogether interwoven with ridiculous Lies, though the Title seemed only to promise the Pen of a Friend (52)." Serio pœnitet quædam nimia acerbis foras erupisse, quæ domi continuisse, & vellem fuerat melius. — Verum ut rem natam intelligo, non erit mihi sollicita causa dicenda apud æquos judices. Ipsa enim aduversariorum procacitas & convitiia sine more effusa largam materiam mihi præbent non tantum ad sperandam abolitionem, sed ad consequendam laudem moderationis at modestiæ. Vidi enim & evolvi hesternæ die à capite ad calcem librum in me conjectum, &c (53). Several Reasons shew, that the Book he had just read, was the Commentary in Gnomas (54). Now that Commentary was a Work of Scribanus (55), and yet Baudius ascribes it to Rosæide, with so much Persuasion, that he declares, nothing can alter that Belief: For, says he, this resembles the other Writings of that Jesuit, like two Drops of Water; there appears the same Genius, Humour, Stile, and Character. We may conclude from hence, by the way, that the best Judges of Stile may be mistaken in their Opinion of this sort of Likeness, and in the Consequences they draw from thence, as to Authors of Books. Non possum demoveri ab ea sententia quam exilissimè ac prorsus perjursum habeam, editorem hujus præclari factus esse Patrem Heriberum Rosæidem. Nam non ovum ovo, nec aqua è puteo tam similis est aquæ, quam liber iste refert nobis indolem, genium & characterem aliorum librorum, qui ab eodem Patre sunt expositi (56). What is remarkable in it is, that Baudius, who feared to find, in the Commentary on his Gnomæ, the Infirmities of which he knew himself guilty, had, as he said, the Comfort to find nothing in it, but such Falsities as were notorious to all those, who knew him. Verebar ne curiosus alienarum popularum observator, ea mihi ex vero objiceret, quæ serio conscientiam remorderent, & diligentius vivendi necessitatem impenderent. Nunc quæ de me inclementer dicit, pleraque talia sunt, ut risum non bitem movent iis qui me norunt, nec ad alios judices provocandum habeo, quàm qui oculis & sensu communi non desistuntur (57). It is commonly the Fault of Satirists; they are too sparing in the Article of Spy-Money; they impute Crimes which are false, and omit those which are true. Baudius disowns the German Author, who had made his Apology in the Chair, against the Commentator on the Gnomæ. "Quidam parasitaster parvulus è Germania huc adveniens, me multum reclamante, impetravit à Senatu nostro Academico, ut sibi liceret publice pro mea dignitate scilicet adversus illum declamare. Ac ne quid ad summam finis sterilitas decisset, aut ut caput unctius referret, etiam orationem illam in vulgus edendam curavit. Testari possum ex animi sententia, mihi factum istud vehementer dupliciuisse. Satiùs enim erat me de seri ab omni patrocinio, quam à tam infirmo tibi cine causam nostram sustentari (58). — A certain insignificant Sycophant coming hither from Germany, obtained leave of our University, in spite of all I could say to the contrary, to make a Declaration in my Defence, against that Author. And that he might completely shew his Aukwardness, or make a sprucer Appearance, he has published that Oration. I can truly say, I am exceedingly displeased with this Performance. For it is much better to be destitute of all Defence, than to take up with so poor a one as this." I must further observe, that the Inveclives, Baudius seems most to repent of, are those which relate to Princes and crowned Heads. He did not spare even the King of France, who was an Ally of the Republic. Sed horrida dicta sunt quæ in Lojolis, in editorem Amphibeatris, in impurissimum Schoppium stringimus. Atque utinam hoc sine sese cobibisset styli nostri procacitas. Sed in Pontificem, in Philippos, in Archiducem, in partium duces, evomit virus acerbissimæ suæ, nec parcat ipsi Liliæ regi (59).

[I] He was at least twice married.] He speaks of his Wife's Death, in a Letter of the tenth of Marib, 1610 (60), and he writes the Twenty first of February, 1613, that he was married again. Opinor jam

(61) Epist. 3.
Cent. IV. te ex fama audisti me chorā maritorum iterum esse adscriptum (61). I have not had time to look over every Letter, Page by Page, so that I cannot tell whether he mentions the Time, when he married his first Wife, or whether he had any Children by her, or not: but I know, that this Wife had Children by another Husband; for Baudius mentions a Son, and a Daughter of his Wife (62), and complains also of the Daughter's ill Houfwife (63). Perhaps the Son-in-Law, which Theophilus gives to this Professor, might be this bad Houfwife's Husband. It may be also, that, for want of Attention, Theophilus calls him Son-in-law, who was only prigignus, the Wife's Son (64). The Author of the Væ Vidit observes, that Baudius had no Children.

[K] Wine and Women were the two Rocks, on which his Reputation was shipwrecked.] Since this Remark will be somewhat long, I shall divide it into Sections.

I. As to the first, he confesses the Fact: See three fine Passages on that Subject, at the Head of his Letters, extracted from his own Letters. I only relate the first and second. "Concurrant omnes, says 'be (66), non dicam ut ille Satyricus, augures, haruspices, sed quidquid est ubique hominum curiosum, qui in aliorum acta tam sedulo inquirent, ut ea fingant quæ nunquam fuerunt, nihil inveniet quod in nobis carere possit livor, quam quod interdum ad exemplum præci Catonis liberalius invitari nos patimur, nec semper confistimus intra sobrietatem veterum Sabinorum. Huic quoque peccato indies moderari conamur, & pulchre procedit. — I defy, not only as the Satirist says, Augurs, and Soothsayers, but also all inquisitive Persons whatever, who pry so indusively into other Peoples Affairs, and forge Facts which never happened, to discover, if they can, any thing in my Character, worthy of Censure, except my now and then indulging a little too freely, after the Example of old Cato, and breaking through the sober Rules of the Sabines. And even this small Fault I am every Day endeavouring to mend, and have gained a good deal of Ground." He expresses this with a better Grace, in the second Passage: "Malignitas obtricatorum nihil aliud in nobis fuggillare potest quam quod nimis commodum sin convivato, & interdum largius adspersor flore Liberi patris (67). — The most malicious can accuse me of nothing but being too good a Companion, and sometimes tasting a little too freely of the Favours of Father Bacchus." Since he has confessed his Fault, there is no occasion to produce Scrivenerius as a Witness against him, who supposes, that Charon, having given Baudius his Choice, either to remain in the other World, or to return into this, on condition to drink Water, and take his first Wife again, Baudius chose the former (68). Here is already something relating to the second Head; Scrivenerius would not have made such a Supposition, if Baudius had lived well with his first Wife.

II. Never had any Man less need to be comforted than he, when he lost her. His good Friend Heinsius could not forbear being merry upon it, both in Prose and in Verse, which he addressed to him; he wrote to Grotius on the same Subject, and told him, That our Age did not come short of That, which had seen Xenophon make an end of his Sacrifice, notwithstanding the News of his Son's Death; nor of That, which had seen Q. Martius go from the Burial of his Son to the Senate. "Baudius, says he to him, made himself drunk the Day he buried his Wife, and left nothing to do for the Comforters; he had effectually administered to himself, before their coming, all the Consolation it was possible for them to think of. The emptiness of his Purse is much more grievous to him, than the Vacancy he has met with in his Bed. I have helped him to some Money,

"which has revived all his Spirits; for, instead of That melancholy Air, and those down-cast Looks, which appeared in him, as if his Wife had been still living, I say, instead of that great Sadness, I perceived him raised all at once to a sort of Gaiey." Baudius noster eo ipso quo uxorem extulit die vinum gustare voluit — omnia solatia quæ exultant adhiberi mentibus solent ipse occupavit. Nihil amicis in luctu reliquit quod vel imputare illi possent — Stabat antea demisso vultu ac tristi: uxorem ejus vivere adhuc credidisset (69). Vix spes melior affulsit, respirare cepit, & constanter multa de fragilitate vitæ disputare: nemo funus esse in adibus existimasset (70). All these Pieces of Heinsius are diverting. But this Inconformity was not the greatest Fault Baudius committed, in relation to that Sex. We shall see, presently, more unlucky Incidents.

As soon as he came into France, he stopped so long at Caen, that there was a Report he was detained there by a Mistris. Non posse me hinc à muliercula divelli quam impotenti amore deperam (71). He denied it, and said, that the Dangers, which he had met with in the Journey, were the Cause of so long a stay. He said also, that, in spite of the Oppressions of the Professors, he might, at least, have taught the Civil-Law at Caen, if he had not engaged himself elsewhere. He gives a very bad Idea of That University, as to the Faculty of the Civil-Law. "Timuerunt sibi Juridici Professores nec ego — eos de imperitiæ possessione dejicerem. — Præses de quo retuli verbis acerbis homines illos castigavit coque assilavit Draconi Hesperidum hortorum. Tones quorum. Quid multa? frementibus miseris illis leguleis partim odio religionis, partim conscientia Inficitæ luez, perfectum est ut qui Leidæ gradum acceptissent, legitime promoti videantur (72). — These Professors of Civil-Law were afraid that I should dispossess them of their Ignorance. — The President, I told you of, severely reprimanded them, and compared them to the Dragon, who watched the Hesperian Gardens. You know on what Account. In short; notwithstanding the Opposition of those wretched half Civilians, partly from the Quarrel of Religion, and partly from the Consciousness of their own Ignorance, it was established, that they, who had taken their Degree at Leyden, should be allowed as regular."

Scrivenerius believed, that Lipsius meant Baudius, when he wrote to Barclay, in the Year 1599. "Scribit ad me, queritur, sed parum aperte, & ulcus aliquod sermonum eâ velle tegi equidem odoror. Si leve curatur, parum est: sin prævum aliquod & doctus (insanabile) doleo causa præclari ingenii quod sese (ah temere, ah stulte) in barathrum & præcepit dedit. Quis illigatum te trifurmi Pegasus expediet Chimæra? Sed meliora opto (73). — He writes to me, and complains, but with so much Reserve, that I suspect some Ulcer at the bottom. If it may be easily healed, the Matter is not great; but if it be of a malignant Kind, and incurable, I shall be sorry for the sake of so ingenious a Man, that he should, foolishly, and inconsiderately, throw himself headlong into such a Pit. Where will you find a Bellerophon to extricate you from this monstrous Chimæra? But I hope better Things." This favours of a Man drawn into, or deeply engaged in, an unhappy Intrigue.

To end with the worst part, I shall anticipate the Order of Time, and here observe, that he had made a Promise of Marriage, which he did not keep. — When he found himself a Widower, and pressed both by his Poverty and Constitution, to seek another Wife, he charged two of his Friends to inform him of the Circumstances of his former Mistress, and declared to them, that, if she was rich, he was ready to marry her before any other. He did not question but that he was still beloved by her. "Veteribus amoribus meis ex animo volo, nec ullam præceptaverim, si ad cæteras dotes accedit etiam copiosus imber qui olim per impluvium defluxit in finem Danaes. — Nisi molestum est, velim aliquid temporis impartiare disquisitioni, quo loco res ejus sitæ sint. Nam quin vivat nostri memor, & non immunis amorum, nullus dubito (74)." The Answer he received, was a Proof that he had too good an Opinion of himself; the Lady declared, the good not love great Drinkers. Baudius apprehended her

This exposed him to Contempt, and Public Laughter. His very Friends made smart meaning, and his Conscience was eased by that Refusal; for he made a Scruple of breaking his Promise; but now he found himself free, since she would not accept of him. "Etsi sincero affectu nympham illam prosequor, tamen magis liberandæ fidei religione, & veterum repromissionum ultro citroque stipularum memoria adductus sum, ut consortium ejus ambire non designarim, quam formæ lenocinio, vel divitiarum conditione (75). — Gaudeo me bona cum nympha ejus gratia liberatum esse nexu veteris promissi, καὶ διακλύου συλλαβῆς, καὶ μωροῦ, cujus adhuc me nonnulla inessebat superstitio (76)." It is remarkable, that all these Scruples of Conscience did not hinder him from annexing a Condition to the Design of executing his promise. Which Condition was, that his former Mistress should be rich (77), or else he would not marry her; and, to soften what might be too hard in this Resolution, he added, that, in this, he only considered her Interest; for, said he, would it not be very injurious to her, to bring me Children, who could expect no other Inheritance from us, but Poverty and Hunger? "Tu vero me tacente satis intelligis quam parum ex usu utriusque foret, τὴν λιμὸν καὶ τὴν πείναν (78), infelici contubernio invicem sociari. Quocirca nisi tam bene fundatum sit patrimonium amicæ, quam unice diligo, ut sine notabili incommodo nostris difficultatibus mederi queat, in rem communem est ut aliud mihi subsidium propiciam. Quod ne in eam partem velit interpretari, quasi quidquam detrimendi cepit amor ille pristinus, quo juvenculam formæ & ætate florentem formæ complexus, testor ex animi sententia me hoc ejus causâ facere, ne liberos educemus in spem egestatis atque esuritionis (79)." He made his Addresses elsewhere, viz. to one, whose Name was Sophia, in whom he found nothing good but her Riches. She had a very brutish Father, from whom he received a thousand Hardships; and the seconded her Father for some time, and complained of having been stolen: Very probably, she had been taking a Ramble for some Days with Baudius, which was then a piece of Gallantry in that Country. Baudius thought this Complaint very ridiculous, and most likely to stain Sophia's Reputation; and he said, by way of Allusion to Fimbria's Process against Scævola, that she had nothing to complain of, except that the Weapon was not thrust up to the Hilt. "Nihil habet quod de nobis queratur, nisi forte velit eam intenter accusationem quam adversus Scævolum ----- quod scilicet non totum telum corpore receperit (80)." Sophia was pacified, and seemed to disapprove her Father's Brutality. Baudius was in Raptures at this, and spoke of nothing but Marriage, though he knew very well, that this Mistress had no other Merit but a good Portion. The last Obstacle was removed, which was a Promise of Marriage, Baudius had made to a prostituted Servant, who sued him on his Promise (81), and I believe, that, after this, the Marriage with Sophia was consummated. The following Passages prove This Lady's ill Qualities, and her Father's Brutality. "Hesternâ die gravior apud Redorem questus sum de ----- Renovavi etiam veteres offensas quod me in causâ desipientis Sophiæ allocutus esset tanquam vitæ iratum, & candidatum patibuli. Sed Sophiam istam suis moribus ulciscendam permitto, si quidem rata habet quæ barbarus parens in me rustice & incivilliter designavit: nam contrarii rumores ad me deferuntur. Nonnulli dicunt eam honorifice & amice de nobis loqui: quod si ita est, recte & ordine facere ipsam arbitror, καὶ γὰρ τὸ γὰρ λαίον εἶναι, & tunc paratus sum omnium prætorum memoriam fidei amnestia ex animo delere, καὶ μὴ μνησικακῆν. Sin talia flagitia probat, nunquam eam sermone fuero dignatus. Sunt enim qui dicant me ab ipsa proscindi tam cruentis convitiis, quasi crimen sit quod vivam (82). ----- Yesterday I complained heavily to the Redor concerning ----- I even ripped up former Grudges, and accused him of having treated me, in the Affair of the foolish Sophia, as 'One angry with Life, and a Candidate for the Gallies.' As for Sophia, I leave her to the Punishment of her own Manners; if she indeed approves of the rude and uncourteous Treatment I have met with from the Brute her Father; for I have been told the contrary. Some say, that she speaks respectfully & friendly of me; if This be true, I think she behaves with justice and decency; and I am then ready to forget every thing past. But, if she approves of such vile Treatment, I will never condescend to speak to her more. For I am informed by some, that she reproaches me with such bitterness, as if it were a Crime, that I am alive." Behold a good-natured Man! he had already shewn, that he was easy to be pacified. "Reversus domum ----- optata omnia comperi de mea Sophia, quæ me absente ancillam lecti & arcanorum sociam misit ad patrem scitatum ----- super nostra majestatem, an durius accepissem plenam familiaritatis repuliam, & an fera bestia factus essem, amissa voluntate revertendi. Ego vero oculum mihi exculpi malim, quam pati ut tam opima conditio elabatur de manibus (83). ----- Returning home, I found every thing relating to my Sophia just as I could wish: She had sent her Chambermaid and Confidant to her Father, to enquire ----- concerning My Majesty; whether I resented her absolutely denying to admit of my Familiarity, and whether I was so furiously enraged, as to resolve never to return. For my own part, I would sooner lose an Eye, than miss so fair an Opportunity of being happy." This Good nature would be less shameful, were it not for the Poverty, to which Baudius was reduced, and the great Estate of His Sophia. We meet with the following Words, in the Ninety fifth Page of the Dominici Baudii amores, and in the first Letter of the 14th Century, Page 479. This Letter was written the Twenty first of July 1612. "Plerique putant hanc labem non alia conditione deletum iri, quam si insulsum pecus uxorem duxero, cui præter Sophiæ nomen nihil adest humani cordis. An ideo pereundum erat Pompeio magno, si Lucullus non esset luxuriosus? Ego invitam cogere non possum ut velit esse conjux invicti Jovis, & tanti non est ut vel illi, vel furioso parenti supplicem. Dos tamen non esset adpernanda, nisi marita foret, & posset abique muliebri capite contingere. Postquam ----- reverfus fuerit, persuasum amicorum decretum est mihi jacere novissimum aleam, & exquirere an mecum lege fidelis καὶ ἀδύλα ἀμνηστίας pacifici velit. Paratus sum ex animi sententia conceptis verbis jurare μὴ μνησικακῆν: dum & ipsa levitatis culpam agnoscat, & parentis furias non approbet. Si tergi versabitur, relinquam illam ulciscendam suis moribus, & aliam consortem invenero, quæ melius intelliget suam felicitatem. ----- Many think I can never wipe off this Disgrace, but by marrying This Foolish Creature, who has nothing of Human, but The Name of Sophia. Would Pompey the Great have been ruined, if Lucullus had not been luxurious? I cannot compel her, against her Will, to be the Wife even of Jupiter himself; and it is not worth my while humbly to sue either to Her, or her mad-brained Father. Her Fortune, I confess, is not despicable, could it be obtained without marrying, and bowing the Woman into the bargain. When he returns, I have resolved, by the Advice of my Friends, to make one Effort more, and try, whether we can come to terms of Agreement, on condition of forgetting every Thing past. I am ready, on my part, sincerely to forget an eternal Oblivion; provided she acknowledges her own Levity, and does not approve of the injurious Treatment of her Father. If she shall refuse to comply with this Offer, I will leave her to the Punishment of her own Manners, and look out for another Wife, who shall better understand her own Happiness." Some Days before he had more Courage. He had a good Opinion of himself: He says, in the same Letter, that he is not so exalted, but he may yet obtain a Woman of Merit, though he has been so foolish, as to pay a long Courtship to an impertinent Xanthippe. "Non adeo exarui ex amoribus & humoribus, ut bona me sapienti femina vendicare non possim, etiam si tam infipienter circa Sophiam deliraverim, ut mihi Socratica fides objecta sit (84)." He was resolved to make a fresh Attempt; but was so much disgusted at This foolish Creature, and her brutish Father, that he almost with-

I am little ſollicitous for the Event; nay I almoſt wiſh to be reſuſed, ſo tired am I of the Father's contumelious Behaviour, and the folly and ſtupidity of the Daughter, who has not common Senſe, and is a Woman only in Name."

We are now come to the moſt diſgraceful Scene of All. Baudius kept a Concubine for ſome time. She was a Servant-Maid, who was common to ſeveral Students, and who, finding herſelf with Child, fathered it on Baudius alone. She inſiſted likewiſe, that he had promiſed her Marriage, and ſummoned him before the Judges, to oblige him to perform his Promiſe. This Affair was both matter of Scandal and Laughter; but they, who know the World, will eaſily believe, that it occaſioned more of the latter, than the former. Baudius's Superiors could do no leſs than diſgrace him, by ſuſpending him from his Office. The Railleries, to which he found himſelf expoſed, made him take a Journey to Ghent. "Inter alias cauſas quæ me movent ut in viam me darem hæc fuit non inſima, ut prudenti abſentia ſubterdicerem me ab importunis conjugii diſparis congratulationibus, quibus cottidie aures meæ circumſonabantur (86). — Among other reaſons, which induced me to take a Journey, This was not the leaſt, that, by prudently abſenting myſelf, I might avoid the Congratulations on an unequal Match, with which I was perpetually teized." He ſeemed to queſtion, whether This Servant-Maid was with Child; but he was afraid, that, if ſhe ſhould lye-in, he ſhould ſwear the Brat to Him; for which reaſon he deſired his Friends to order it ſo, that ſuch a Slut as ſhe ſhould not be admitted to take her Oath; and offered voluntarily to do whatever the Laws of Humanity required; that is, to take care of the Child, which ſhould be born: but he thought it hard to be obliged to it. He did not deny, but that he had promiſed the Girl Marriage; but pretended, that ſuch a Proſtitute, as ſhe, did not deſerve to enjoy the Benefit of the Laws: He did not believe, that any Faith ought to be kept with this Kind of Hereſies; for he recollected, that he had read ſo in the Code; but, as he could not cite the place, he deſired Grotius to put his Advocate upon producing That Law, in order to put a ſtop to the Proceedings of his Doxy. And, as This Girl's Pretenſions was the only Thing, which hindered Baudius's Miſtreſs from ſigning the Marriage-Contract, he deſired his Friend to diſpatch the Matter. "Such Infamous Wretches, such Diabolical Victims to Public Lust, deserve not the Regard of the Law; as I remember to have read somewhere in the Code, though the Passage does not at present occur to my Memory. I desire you, upon the Receipt of This Letter, to send for the Advocate Vander Werven, who, by reciting the dreadful Denunciation, may terrify This Creature, who gives me so much Disturbance. But be as expeditious as possible; for Love is impatient of Delay." This is what he wrote on the Twenty eighth of March. He was not clear of the Affair in the Month of June; the Girl was yet in hopes of being married to him either by fair or foul Means; and Baudius durst not appear before his Mistress, during this Suit with his Concubine. "Hoc nisi fundamentum præstruatur, non finit θυμός ἀγνώσκει, ut viam affectem ad meam Divam, quæ non intelligit suæ bonæ: nec ideo tamen demovebor ab amandi proposito, quamvis spes aliqua supererit expugnandi ferreum istud pectus (90). -----
"Till This Foundation be laid, my Pride will not suffer me to approach my Goddess, who does not understand her own Good: yet will I persist in my Resolution of paying my Addressee to her, whilst there is any hope of conquering that stubborn Breast." He was inclined to enter into Articles with the Girl, and desired Grætius to draw them up; hoping, that the Creature, intimidated by his Threatnings, would sign the Agreement. "A tuo discessu nec patrem τῆς ἀδελφῆς Σοφίας allocutus sum, nec me conveniendum curavit Mercurii mater, nisi quod audio eam adhuc pallescere ebriosis, fœtibus, & furiosis spes de matrimonio.

Cuperem ad me mitti per hunc ipsum nuncium formulam transactionis, quam ipse concepisti. Spero me effecturum in seculo metu majoris malitias ut cupide subignem, & voluntariam condemnationem fubeat (91). -----
"Since your Departure, I have not once spoke to the Father of the foolish Sophia, who, I am informed, still entertains vain hopes of the Match. But, sooner

The Goat shall mix with The Appulian Wolf.

"What would you advise me to do? To wait the Event of the Suit? The Impatience of a Lover cannot bear delay: though I have bid a long Adieu to these Follies, at least have made a Truce with them. I could wish you would send me by the Bearer of This The Articles of Accommodation, which you yourself have conceived. I hope, by threatening her with something worse, to prevail upon her readily to sign them, and subscribe her own Condemnation." The Affair was yet undecided in the Month of July following (92), and Baudius thought it very strange, that This Slut was not banished out of the Country. "Tot Justitiæ Antifites unicam maleficam Circen, quæ meos sensus venenavit, amoliri non possunt, saltem ut Leïdam contagione sua, & ædes meas noxia vicinitate, non inflectet (93). ----- So many Dispensers of Justice cannot rid me of One mischievous Circe, who bewitched my Senses; nor even prevent her from infesting Leyden with her Contagion, and my House with her baneful Neighbourhood. He believed, that she was suffered to continue his Neighbour, that the Indignity of so many Affronts might force him to retire elsewhere. Video hoc agi ut contentis baud tolerandis ἀγνώπῳ θυμῷ ἀδigar at discipendam pedam viam, & quærendam baud ingressi atque inopis exilii sedem (94). At last he put an end of the Affair, not by a Sentence of the Judges, but by way of Accommodation, on the Twentieth of October 1612. He conceded as little as possible; redemi me captum quam potui minimo (95); after which he was soon married. He wrote to Peter Rubens (96), that he was very well satisfied with his Wife. I do not know, whether he changed his Mind; but, however it be, This Marriage was of no long Continuance. Baudius died the Twenty second of August 1613, being reduced to a miserable Condition by a Delirium. Delirio ac Vigiliis continuis miserè attritus, omnique tandem robore exutus (97). His best Friends laughed at his Follies in Love. One of them propoed him as an Example to all Incontinent Persons, and exhorted them to restrain their Passions by the most austere Remedies, rather than indulge them like Baudius:

Quisquis es, exemplo tanti moveare marii,
Parce libidinibus luxuriose tuis.
Addita sit potius lascivo fibula membro,
Ut vindicta tuam transeat ista domum (98).

*Whoe're Thou art, a Slave to Joys of Sense,
Let This Example teach thee Contenance.
Wou'd'st Thou avoid vindictive Fortune's Frown,
Let the strong Button keep the Rebel Member down.*

See the Collection, entitled Baudii Amores, published by Scrivierius, in the Year 1638. You will find there, at page 77, A Cento Virgilianus of Daniel Heinsius, "ad Dominicum Baudium, qui postquam ignarus cum ancilla, cum qua tum alii, tum plurimi scholastici concubant, aliquandiu congressus esset, solus præter expectationem prole ab ea est donatus — to Dominic Baudius, who, after having corresponded with a Girl, who was common to several Students, had alone a Child unexpectedly fathered upon him."

No doubt, some will say, it would have been better to have pointed out, in the Margin, where these Things are to be found, than to produce so many Passages of This Author; but many others will be glad not to be at the Trouble of looking for them. It is to please the Lazy, whose number was never so great as in This Age, that I have taken the Pains to collect These Passages of Baudius. Let no one complain, that I disturb the Ashes of the Dead; for I say nothing but what Baudius's Friends have published, and what other Authors have informed the Public of several times. See Spizellus (99), who cites a Book, which I would willingly have consulted: It was printed in the Year 1675 (100).

[L] We must not believe all that the satyrical Scioppius has published on This last Head.] He speaks too ill of him, to deserve credit: the most infamous Pimping, and Magic, are the Exploits, which he attributes to him. His Latin Words cannot modestly be rendered into English: The Original is This: "Baudius Parisiis, ubi multis annis in concubitu summa cum infamia & velut quadruplatoris filium deceptor, vixit, non tantum magis deditus, incantatoribus & sortilegis ædes suas aperuit, & concubine suæ filiolum ad peragenda nefaria sacra commodavit, Dæmonique de thesauris reconditis, impimisque de Petronio utrum is alicubi integer existeret, consuluit; sed etiam amicis quibusdam majorem quandam ingenii divinitatem præferentibus ejusdem concubine filium, puerum non elegantem, turpissimum leno prostituit, ut cum postea tumentibus pueri maricis scelus propalatum iri metueret, quo minus eum veneno contubernales tollerent, minime impedivit, actumque jam de missello puero fuerat, nisi unius contubernalis acuminis expedit fuisset, ancilla, quæ morbo mederi sciret, inventa. Hæc nequamquam à me fingi, neminem paulò humaniorum Parisiis ignorare puto (101)." The General Sense of which is as follows; that "Baudius, living many Years in a State of Fornication at Paris, conversed with Magicians and Enchanters, and consulted the Devil about hidden Treasures, and particularly whether Petronius was any where to be found entire; and that, having prostituted the Son of his Concubine, and being in danger of being

Temper are exposed to the hazard of losing a good Name. It cannot be denied, that Baudius was of an amorous Complexion: He was but a Student in Divinity, when he fell in Love with a Girl, who lodged at the Professor Lambert Danaus's House (b). The Remarks will inform us farther of This Affair. He was too free in his Opinions, and even in his Discourse, and had not the Prudence to accommodate himself to the Prejudices of the Times; This could not but create him Enemies, and expose himself to the ill Effects of their rash Judgments (i). He consulted Platonic Ideas too much; which is the reason, why he was a little too much scandalized at the Disputes, which were raised in Holland. He foretold the ill Consequences of them, some of which proved false, and others true. He thought They would occasion an Alteration in the Government; in This he was mistaken [M]; he believed they would create a Schism; In this he judged right [N]. They, who published his Letters, have procured more Delight

(b) See his 26th Letter Cent. II. pag. 224.

(i) See Remark [M].

" discovered, by some Marks of the Injury he had done him, he would have suffered him to be poisoned, had not an Old Woman been found, who undertook to cure the Child." If These things were so well known at Paris, as Scioptius affirms, how came it, that the First President appointed Baudius to be his Son's Secretary in an Embassy? Scioptius invented This, or had it from ill-grounded Stories, and divulged it in revenge for the abusive Language, which Baudius had given him, even before The Scalliger Hypobolimus appeared (102).

[M] He thought They would occasion an Alteration in the Government; in This He was mistaken.] We must hear Himself: He declares, that, were it not for Conscience, and Religion, he would have retired elsewhere long before, and that the violent Disputes of the Divines, and many other Disorders, made him fear, that the Work of the Reformation would be very much endangered by them. " Nisi me in his locis conscientie scrupulus, & religionis vinculum attineret, jam pridem captum esset augurium de mihi, grando, nec Leida spes meas includeret. Quamquam non pessime mecum agitur. Sed nec ea nostri ratio habetur, quam oportuit. Theologorum etiam nostrorum dissidentium, & virulentarum concertationes, odia fratrum, quæ ne morte quidem finiuntur, aliæ nostræ militiæ flagitia, penè efficiunt ut & illud superbum nomen reformatæ religionis, & ipsa causa incipiat mihi esse dubiæ sanitatis. — Præfigit mihi animus imminere his Provinciis fatalem rerum commutationem, & ex istis vitis rediturum aliquando veteris imperii desiderium. Suspectus sum multis, & charus acceptusque non paucis, quod voce & stilo passim inculco subditorum obsequia in legitimis Principes, & pleno ore decanto veras laudes Archiducum (103)."

— Did not a Scruple of Conscience, and the Tie of Religion, detain me, I had e'er now departed in a good Hour, nor had Leyden any longer been the Object of my Wishes. Though my Condition here is far from being the worst. But I do not meet with proper Regard. Besides, The virulent Disputes of Our Divines, The Animosities among Brethren, which Death itself cannot put an end to, and Other Enormities of our Warfare, induces me to suspect, that the proud Name of Reformation, and the Cause itself, is but short-lived. — I foresee a fatal Alteration in the Affairs of These Provinces, and am apprehensive, that the Intestine Divisions, which reign among us, will make the People wish for the ancient Government. I render myself suspected to Many, and acceptable to a Few, by inculcating, both in Conversation and Writing, the Obedience of Subjects to their Lawful Princes, and celebrating the true Praises of the Arch-Dukes." I question not, but Baudius propounded the Doctrine of the Obedience of Subjects, which he mentions, with too much Indiscretion, and Confidence; so that it is no wonder, if he was hated by several People. He was so bold also, as to infer This Doctrine in a public Thesis; and it is observable, that his Academical Superiors did not oblige him to expunge it, but only ordered him to inform the Youth, that they should not embrace such Opinions inconsiderately. Querit primum ex me, an statuissem præsidium & auctoritatem suffragii commodare defendendis corollariis periculose alæ plenius, ut est disputare in ambas partes, An religio sit de substantia reipublicæ, & negare fas esse subito privatoque homini ob causam religionis arma sumere contra Principem, & id generis alia. Respondi, causam non videri cur in hoc atrio libertatis non sit fas absque pervicacia sentire quæ velis, & quæ sentias exprimere. Tamen rogatus ut admonerem juventutem ne temere & absque delectu talibus axiomatis assensum præberet, significavi me facturum (104). — He first asked me, whether I had resolved to undertake the Defence of dangerous Propositions, such as the Question, whether Religion be essential to a State, and the Assertion, that it is unlawful for a private Man, and a Subject, to take up Arms against his Prince, for the sake of Religion. I replied, that I saw no reason, why, in This Seat of Liberty, a man might not, without the Imputation of Perverse-ness, think as he pleases, and speak as he thinks. However, being desired to admonish the Youth, not to assent to such Propositions rashly, and without Examination, I promised to do so. Never was Man fitter to gain himself Enemies by the Liberty of his Tongue, and his Maxims, than Baudius: " We make War, said he, with the most powerful Princes of the World, and yet we are under the Correction of an hundred petty Rulers: Bellum gerimus contra potentissimos Mundi Monarchas, & servire cogimur istis minutoribus Satrapis (105). See the Liberty he takes of censuring the Divines, who had condemned Vorslius, without hearing him. Observe the ill Consequences, which, he says, must follow, if these Gentlemen are suffered to decide concerning the Honour and Merit of others, on meer Presumptions, Suspensions, and Hear-says. " Evadet ista effrænis audacia in optimi cujusque deformationem, si præjudiciis, suspicionibus, rumoriculis, & susurris, tantum licentia permittitur, ut fama & fructu dignitatis exuantur viri doctrina meritisque speculabiles. Sed de negotio fratrum, & sacrae gregis, dabitur alias oportunitas differendi locus (106). — This unbridled Liberty, will blast the Reputations of the best of Men, if Men of Learning and Merit must lose their Characters upon Prejudices, Suspensions, Rumours, and Whispers. But I shall have a better Opportunity of considering the Business of the Brotherhood, and sacred Herd." Once again, He was very fit to gain himself Enemies, and I am not surprized, that so many heinous Calumnies have been spread concerning him. In the Year 1609, he took a Journey into Flanders. During his Absence, a Thousand Stories went about, that he was gone to change his Religion, that he was already provided of a good Benefice, that he had turned Monk, and an hundred other things of this Nature, which gave occasion to the Thirty third Letter of the III^d Century. He was in such dread even of the Absurdities of Common Fame, that he wrote This Letter to Two of the Curators.

[N] He believed they would create a Schism; in this he judged right.] He built his Conjecture on the great Animosity, which he observed on both Sides. The Points in dispute seemed to him capable of being accommodated, provided The Combatants would but hear each other with a charitable Disposition. It was therefore the Disposition of the contending Parties, which made him fear they would come to a total Rupture. He was upon the Spot; and could see, in what Manner Gomarus, and his Friends, on one side, and Arminius, with his Adherents, on the other, mixed their private Passions with the Interest of their Doctrines. He declared freely, that the Spaniards and Hollanders would sooner agree together, than These two Ecclesiastical light and Usefulness to the Readers, than Honour to his Memory. They are politely written [O], and are full of Wit; but he commends himself too much in them; He appears too Poor [P], too Importunate to his Friends, too Craving, too Vain, too Selfish, and too Irregular. This is to apologize for the Age, he lived in, of which he complained so much. It is partly by These Faults, that several learned Men render themselves contemptible in the Places, where they live, whilst they are the admiration of Those to whom they are known only by their Works. Notwithstanding the Length of This Article already, I cannot forbear subjoining here a very remarkable Particular; to wit, that Baudius had undertaken Factions. Here follow his own Words: I set them down, that I may not be thought to deliver my own Opinions under his Name. I am in this, and many other Places, a bare Transcriber. "Utinam omnes nostri muneris & ordinis pari voto ac studio in eandem mentem conspirarent! Sed facilius conveniet inter Belgas & Hispanos, quam inter fratres, ubi semel in contentionem exarscere cœperunt. Omnino res erumpit in schisma, nisi fortibus consiliis huic malo occurratur. ---- Si spiritus docilitatis & Christianæ caritatis ducerentur duces (ut sic dicam) partium, confectum negotium esset. Sed utrinque videre est magnos animorum motus, manifestam concursionem, ut suffragatores sibi concilient, denique mentem contentionis studiosiorem, quam indagandæ noscendæque veritatis:

Iliacos intra muros peccatur & extra.

"Sed ob Attridarum culpas supplicium ferunt Achivi: & Academia pessimi odoris est non solum apud extraneos, verum etiam apud nostros cives (107).

 "will end in a Schism, if the Evil be not provided
 "against with the utmost Prudence and Caution. ---- "Were the Leaders of each Party (if I may so call "them) governed by a Spirit of Teachableness and "Christian Charity, the Business would be done.
 "But, on both Sides, we see great Animosity, a "manifest Struggle who shall gain the most Converts,
 "and a Temper of Mind more disposed for Contention,
 "than the Discovery of Truth;

Alike in Guilt Besieger, and Besieg'd.

"The Greeks suffered for the Offences of the Sons
 "of Atreus; and the University sinks in the Nostrils
 "not only of Foreigners, but even of our own Countrymen."

[O] His Letters are written politely. We read in the Scaligerana as follows: "Baudius a une Stile non Ciceronien, mais du temps de Domitianus: je garde toutes les Lettres de Baudius. ---- Baudius writes in a Stile, not Ciceronian, but such as was practised in the Time of Domitian: I keep all his Letters by me." Scaliger, therefore, thought them elegant, and good. It does not appear, that Baudius's Style is properly That of any Age of Latinity.

[P] He appears too Poor. It was not so much the Honour of being the States Historiographer, as the Salary of That Office, which made him solicit for it so earnestly. He put off his Creditors, till the Payment of his Pension of Historiographer; That Time never came; and They would be no longer put off in That manner; inasmuch that he was reduced to Great Straits. "Flagitantium importunitas efficit me morosiores, quam naturæ meæ Genius, & amicitia tuæ reverentia patiatur. Affidue enim obtundor à molestis Creditoribus, quorum nomina rejicio in spem obtinendi ejus muneris; sed tandem lacerati sunt hoc palpo, ut ulterius produci non possint (108). ---- The Importunity of my Creditors sours my Temper more than my natural Disposition, and the regard I have for your Friendship, allow of. I put off the payment of what they demand by the hopes of obtaining That Post; but They have been so long wheedled with This Pretence, that they are resolved to be put off no longer." When he said, that his Estate feared neither Thieves, Fire, nor other Calamity,

Non incendia, non graves ruinas,
 Non facta impia, non dolos veneni,
 Non casus alios periculum;

and that It resembled That of Bias (109); The Application was not more ingenious, than true: He spoke like an Historian, and not like a Rhetorician. At last came his Pension of Historiographer; but it was only as a drop of Water to a Thirsty Man: He foresaw it, and had been told of it; wherefore he wanted another Remedy, viz. a rich Wife. "Si possem in nassam matrimonii illicere foemininum aliquod opime dotatum (agnoscis heic facundiam supplementi chronicorum) non a'pernerer dona decorum. Sed ad eam spem aspirare non audeo, quamdium mihi certamen erit cum hydra molestorum flagitatorum (110). ---- Could I but prevail upon some very rich Lady to marry me, I should be thankful to Heaven for the Blessing. But I dare not entertain such an hope, whilst I am combating with an Hydra of importunate Duns." Let us add to this what he wrote to his Patron Vander Myle. "Recte dicebas nuper, nihil aliud posse locare in solido, & ad portum bonæ spei appellere quassatam ratem Baudii, quam opimum aliquod conjugium: sed procax istud genus divitum ac fortunatarum mulierum spernit viros fama meritique celebres, nisi censu quoque censentur (111). ---- What you said, the other Day, is very true, that nothing but a wealthy Match can secure, and bring Home safe, poor Baudius's scattered Vessels; but the Misfortune is, your moneyed Ladies despise Men, even of the greatest Reputation, who have not as much Money, as Merit." But no Relief came time enough: In vain did he beseech the Curators, with the most moving Expressions, to deliver him from the hard Persecution of his Creditors. "Humanitatis tuæ genium adjuro atque obtestor per Deum immortalem, per fas Christianæ Charitatis, per vinculum sanctæ fidei, & quidquid apud gentes venerandum & antiquum habetur, impone tandem optatum finem diuturnæ expectationi; neu me patere longius versari inter sacrum & saxum, sed ictu Creditorum, qui meas aures affidue molestis vocibus circumsonant, ut defæcato animo studia doctrinæ trahere nequeam (112). ---- By the Eternal God, by the Laws of Christian Charity, by the Bond of Holy Faith, and by whatever The World esteems Venerable and Sacred, I adjure, I beseech your compassionate Nature, to put, at length, a wished for Period to my tedious Expectation; nor suffer me any longer to continue in this Perplexity, under the Labors of Creditors, who are perpetually dunning me, and interrupting my Studies." He was left to their Mercy; and, except his Person, they seized on all that was in his House. The Jesuits of Antwerp knew it, and insulted him upon it. Read but these Verses, taken from the Thirty seventh Page of the Va Vidisti!

undertaken a Work, designed to effect a Coalition of Religions [2]: A Work, which, besides other Talents, required a great Share of Piety, as he himself assured Thuanus, in communicating to him his Design. You will find his own Words below.

*Baudius had run up a long Tavern-Score;
(That Baudius lov'd his Glafs, you knew before)
The cruel Vintner, when he cou'd not pay,
Carried Beds, Tables, Chairs, and All away:
Yet All too little: what remains there yet?
Say, Baudius! Shall your Person pay the Debt?
No! — Landlord, take my Books: if That won't do, Away with Lamp, and Oil, and Papers too:
But at his Liberty let Baudius move,
From Tavern still to Tavern free to rove.*

Scrivenerius, Baudius's good Friend, says little less, than the Jesuits.

(113) I take the meaning of this to be, that Baudius married a Widow with three Children.

En, cum jure trium natorum ducitur uxor (113);
Et simul in barathrum præcipit amor amans.
Sic labuntur opes: sic nil stipendia profunt;
Pensio sic domino sæpe negata suo.
Pallia sic alius, Cajæque monilia fervat:
Æra fugant inopem sic aliena famem.
Proflit & duris urgens in rebus egestas:
Pignora stant, vacua non redimenda manu (114).

(114) Scrivenerius, in Baudii Amoris, p. 13.

*A Wife, at length, behold! The Lover gains,
And thence the Right, Three Children give, obtains;
Yet, cruel Fate! to Prison dragg'd must go:
Thus there's an End of Wealth, and Pension too.
Rich Cloaths and Jewels, once the wealthy Dame's, Transferr'd from Caia, now Another claims.
Whilst pressing Want, with meagre Look, stands by,
And, unredeemable, his Pledges lie.*

[2] He had undertaken a Work, designed to effect a Coalition of Religions: What he says of it himself, is this. "Jampridem animo concepi opus, & statu arduum, & usu maximè necessarium, quod ipsum olim aggressus is, de quo nuper multo nobis sermo fuit, Georgius Cassander. Hic, tamen nihil dicas, tamen auguror animo quid cogitationi tuæ occurrat; esse nimirum rem tantæ molis, ut eam vi mente complecti possim, nedum facultate consequi. Fateor equidem ad hanc provinciam deligari par esse hominem instructum omnibus ingenii ac doctrinæ copiis. Opus insuper

"multiplici inquisitione, varia librorum supellectile, plurima rerum memoria, & quod familiam ducit, pietate. Sed utilitatis magnitudo, & penuria talium virorum, debet etiam ad hunc honestissimum laborem mediocres viros invitare, ut, si a spe perficiendi abint, saltem præclaræ voluntatis conscientia persuantur. Ego mihi conscius sum quam parum possum, sed aggrediendi studium probis omnibus me probaturum non despero. Deum certè confido piis conatibus adfuturum, in quem precipue intuens, id oneris tollere decrevi. Quod si saltem effecero, ut aliorum scribendi studia excitentur, qui digne hanc spartam exornare possint, nihil est quod me non affecutum esse exiliumem (115). — I have, a long time, conceived the Design of a difficult, but very necessary, Work, which was undertaken, likewise, by George Cassander: He, I mean, of whom we had, lately, so much Discourse. Here, I guess at your Thoughts, before you declare them; namely, that the Work is of so extensive and difficult a Nature, as scarce to be comprehended, much less executed, by me. I confess, The Undertaking requires a Person of the greatest Ability and Learning, much Enquiry, many Books, a great Memory, and, above All, a pious Disposition. But the great Usefulness of It, and the Scarcity of Persons so qualified, is sufficient to engage Men of moderate Talents in so generous an Undertaking: that, if They cannot flatter themselves with the Hopes of Success, They may, at least, enjoy the Consciousness of a worthy Intention. I am sensible of my own Inability; but I do not despair of approving my Intentions to All Good Men. At least, God, I doubt not, will assist my Endeavours; in Confidence of whose Favour, I have determined to undertake the Task. And if I can but excite others to employ their Pens more successfully on the same Subject, I shall have obtained the Utmost of my Wishes." Colomies, who has preserved to us these Words of Baudius, adds; "Opus, animo, ut puto, conceptum, nunquam prodiit. Hinc patet, cur Baudium Georgii Cassandri Afficem in Gallia Orientali dixerim, quod multis perobscuro, nec immerito, videbatur (116). — This intended Work was, I think, never published; which is the Reason, why, in the Gallia Orientalis, I call Baudius The Page of George Cassander; which to many seem'd obscure, and not without Reason."

BAUDOUIN (a) (FRANCIS), in Latin Baldwinus, a famous Civilian, was born at Arras, the first of January, 1520. He studied Six Years in the University of Louvain; afterwards he was some time with a great Lord (b), at the Court of Charles V; and then went into France, where he acquired the Friendship of the most Learned Men (c), and, among others, That of Charles du Moulin, at whose House he lodged (d). The eager Desire of being acquainted with the most famous Ministers, induced him to travel into Germany [A]: He saw

[A] The eager Desire of being acquainted with the most famous Ministers. This is the only Fault, which the Roman Catholics could impute to Him; if we may believe his Elogist, Papirus Masso. I have carefully perused That Author, to discover whether Baudouin ever forsook the outward Profession of the Church of Rome. But I find nothing, which can persuade me of it; for His becoming acquainted with Calvin, and Bucer, to learn, from their own Mouths, the Reason of their Separation, is no Sign, that he was a Protestant. It was meer Curiosity, and, at the most, but a kind of Distrust, which signifies nothing, unless it be added, that, having heard the Reasons of These Reformers, he found them so good, that he came over to their Side. Now Masso is so far from saying this, that, on the contrary, he tells us, that Baudouin disapproved of their Reasons. "In Germaniam profectus à defensoribus novæ sectæ intelligere voluit, quas ob causas à Romana & veteri Ecclesia decessisset. — quorum opiniones Non Probans, Bucerum tamen & Melancthonem aiebat sibi ob modestiam placuisse: Calvinum displicuisse propter nimiam vindictæ & sanguinis si-tim quam in eo deprehendisset (1). — He travelled into Germany, to learn from the Defenders of the New Sect, for what Reasons they had separated from the Roman and Ancient Church. — And, though he did not approve of their Notions, yet he commended Bucer for his Modesty, but was displeased, he said, with Calvin, for That Thirst after Revenge and Blood, which he discovered in him." He says, I confess, that there was, formerly, an Intimacy between Calvin and Baudouin (2). But does this imply, that the latter had been a Huguenot? May not the Reader imagine, that they were acquainted at College, before Calvin became The Head of a Party? You may tell me, that Chronology does not allow of This; I reply, that you are much to blame, if you desire to be understood only by Those, who are acquainted with the Nativities of several Persons, and will take The Trouble of arguing from Thence. Your Duty is to express Baudouin's Abjuration in such clear Terms, that any Reader may see it from your Book alone, without the Help of Memory, or Reflexion. I go yet further, and maintain, that Those very Persons, who should

Being returned to Paris, he was invited to Bourges, to be Professor of Civil-Law [B]; and he discharged This Office with so much Honour, that he made his Colleague Duaren jealous of him (e). At the end of Seven Years, he left That Professorship, to teach the Civil-Law at Tubingen (f), whither he was invited; but, being informed, in his Journey, that du Moulin designed to return to that University, he stopped at should remember, that Calvin was at the Head of a Sect, before Baudouin left the College, will not find any thing, which looks like an Abjuration, in the familiaris quondam fui; for, by explaining These Words by other Passages of Papyrus Maffo, They will fix upon this Sense of Them: Baudouin, having assured Calvin, that he sincerely enquired after the Truth, had several Conferences with him, in which his Wit, Docility, and Sagacity, so charmed Calvin, that He made a Friend of This Heretic, even before he was fully convinced of the Truth of his Doctrine. Their Intercourse continued a long time; for two Years are not too long for solving the Difficulties, which Baudouin might propose. Calvin, who hoped to gain over, and wished it passionately, cared him very much, and opened his Heart freely to him. At last This Prey escaped him: Baudouin, not finding all his Objections fully answered, would not embrace the new Doctrine. This is the Sense, which might be given to the Words of Papyrus Maffo. He should not, therefore, have expressed himself in a Manner, so apt to mislead the Reader.

Moreri is yet more to blame; for he cannot justify himself, by alledging the Privileges of an Elogist. He declares, by the Title of his Book, that he acts the Part of an Historian: he could not, therefore, allow himself the Liberty, which Maffo might pretend to, under the favourable Title of Elogium Francisci Baudouin. Maffo, intending to write the Elogy of a famous Civilian, might say, "I thought it allowable to disguise what is disadvantageous to the Memory of my Heroe." A bad Excuse, and a continual Source of Illusion, and Falshood! But, after all, it comes better from a Panegyrist, than an Historian. What shall we say, then, to Moreri, who contented himself with these Words; "He had the Curiosity to visit Calvin, and the other Heads of the Protestants. It is said also, that he was inclined to go over to their Party, but, that the reading of a Piece of George Cassander hindered him from it (3). He had contrasted a Friendship with Calvin, but it was of no long Continuance." So far from finding the Abjuration of Popery in these Words, it appears clearly from them, that Baudouin never abjured the Church of Rome. Where is then The Historical Sincerity, and Peripatuity, which require, that, if all other Books were burnt, the History alone of a Man should plainly inform every Reader whether he said, or did, such a thing? The Fault, which I censure, is, therefore, very great, if it be true, that Francis Baudouin changed his Religion: It will, therefore, appear enormous to Those, who know, that he changed his Religion at least seven times. Read the public Re-proof, which he received for it; it is not expressed in general Terms, but attended with Circumstances.

Ejectum te, Balduino, & excommunicatum ab omnibus piis, quicumque in Gallia aut Germania nomen tuum audierint, negare non potes. Septies his viginti annis religionem mutasti. Non sapius ferè serpentes pellem mutant. Educatus es apud tuos in Flandria Papisticè. Postèa Genève Christianam Religionem professus es: eoque nomine aliquoties ad corporis Christi communionem accessisti: Inde Lutetiam profectus Papisticum habitum recepisti. Mox Geneviam reversus, & in Calvini contubernio, mensa, familiaritate, menfes multos commoratus, iterum Evangelicè nominis factus es. Postèa Biturigibus ad Papisticam Idololatriam, tanquam canis ad vomitum, redisti. Inde Argentoratum profectus, Evangelicum te professus es: cum Petro Martyre vixisti. Cœnam Dominicam in Gallorum Ecclesiâ amplius decies participasti. Mox Heidelbergam delatus confessioni Gallicarum Ecclesiarum, sub qua paulo antè cœnam Dominicam duodecies sumpteras, hostis factus es, & Hefullianis te partibus dedisti. Tandem in Galliam reversus, quantum Papista factus es. Horum si quid falsum aut fictum sit, volo ut mihi oculos eruas:

aut, ut calumniatorum tuum supplicium imitemur, crura mihi suffragas (4). ----- You cannot deny, Baudouin, that All Good Men, either in France or Germany, who had heard of your Name, passed Sentence of Excommunication on you. In the Space of twenty Years last past, you have changed your Religion seven times. Serpents scarce oftener cast their Skins. You was educated a Papist, in Flanders, your Native Country. Afterwards, at Geneva, you made Profession of the Christian Religion; under which Name you sometimes partook of the Communion of the Body of CHRIST. From thence going to Paris, you turned Papist again; afterwards, returning to Geneva, and being many Months intimately acquainted with Calvin, you became once more an Evangelic. Some time after, at Bourges, you returned to Popery, as a Dog to his Vomit. From thence going to Strasburg, you professed yourself a Protestant; and conversed with Peter Martyr. You received the Sacrament more than ten Times in The French Church. Not long after, at Heidelberg, you declared War against the Confession of the Gallican Church, under which, but a little before, you had twelve times communicated, and went over to the Party of The Hefullians. At last, returning to France, you embraced Popery for the fourth Time. If This be not All true, I give you leave to pull out my Eyes, or (to imitate your own Punishment for Calumny) to break my Legs." These Words are taken from a long Letter, written to Baudouin, in the Year 1564. The same Computation had been already mentioned to him in the Year 1562, and with very curious Circumstances; for he was put in mind, I. That, having desired to be admitted to the Holy Sacrament in the French Church at Strasburg, he had made a long Declaration of his Faith in the Presence of the Assembly. II. That, during his Abode at Geneva, he had made some public Discourses on Matters of Religion. "Verbofissimam fidei tuæ confessionem publice in templo non infrequentius hominum conventu magna & confidenti voce pronuntiasses, ut ad sacræ Cœnæ & corporis Christi communionem recipereris ---- in publica (ut vocant) congregatione confesseque pastorem & doctorem hominum tanquam Saul inter Prophetas verba de rebus sacris faceres (5). ----- You had pronounced, with a loud and assured Tone of Voice, in a full Church, before a large Congregation, a very long Confession of your Faith, in order to be admitted to the Communion of the Eucharist. ----- You discoursed of divine Matters, like Saul among the Prophets, in a public Congregation (as they call it) and Assembly of Pastors and learned Men." I have read this in a Letter, which Francis Hofman is said to have been the Author of. Observe, that he is deceived in the Circumstance of Time; for he supposes, that Baudouin made his first Abjuration of Popery at Strasburg; This is false; he did it, there, the third time. The Protestants gave him the Surname of Ecebolius, to signify, that he changed his Religion as often as his Linnen; and they quarrelled so often with him for it, in their Writings, that no One can pretend Ignorance of it (6). See the second Volume of the Disputes of Voëtius, page 780.

[B] He was invited to Bourges, to be Professor of the Civil-Law.] We shall touch on a second Fault of The Writers, who speak of him; They scarce ever distinguish at what time he was provided with such, or such Offices. Mr Menage, who avoided This Fault, observes, that he was Professor of the Civil-Law, at Bourges, from 1549 to 1556 (he should have said, from 1548 to 1555), and that he received the Doctor's Cap, there, from the Hands of Eggenarius Baro (7). The Ceremony of This Reception was performed the twelfth of March 1549, as Mr Catherinot informs us (8). He adds, that, in the Year 1553, the Wages of Francis Duaren amounted to Nine hundred and twenty Livres, Those of our Baudouin to Three at Straßburg, where for a Year he read Civil Law Lectures. Afterwards he went to Heidelberg, where he was Professor of the Civil-Law and History near five Years, till he was sent for by Anthony de Bourbon, King of Navarre [C], who made him Tutor to his Bastard. He carried his Disciple to Trent, and, understanding,

Three hundred and fifty, and Those of Hugh Demeu to Two hundred and thirty. I observe This, to convict Pappyrus Masso of a Falshood, who says, that Baudouin's Wages were as good, as Those of his Colleagues. "Accerfitur à Biturgibus ad docendi munus suscipiendum, futurus Collega Baronis, & Duareni Jurisconsultorum, accepturique de publico honorarium QUANTUM illis daretur (9). ----- "He was invited, by the People of Bourges, to take upon him a Professorship, in conjunction with Baro and Duaren, Lawyers, upon a Promise of a Stipend equal to what his Colleagues received." I have shewn, elsewhere (10), that he is guilty of Another Falshood. Mr Catherinet remarks, under the Year 1549, That Baudouin was for some time suspected of Heresy, as having been a Disciple of John Calvin at Geneva and Commensal of Charles du Moulin, at Paris. He says also, that, in 1556, Baudouin wrote against Duaren about Benefices, and that Duaren called him, in Contempt, Balbin. See, continues he, his Picture, in a Letter of Duaren, of the thirteenth of June 1556. I give some Extracts of This Letter in another Place (11). Note, that, during his Stay at Bourges, he held a Correspondence with Calvin by Letters, and assured him, that he was a good Protestant in his Heart (12). He was upbraided with having suborned a rich Widow at Bourges (13), and having left That University, without taking Leave of his Landlord (14). I only mention these Things, that some Circumstances may be seen of the Profession, which our Baudouin exercised in the University of Bourges. Mr Ménage affirms, that, in 1556 (15), he made, there, the Funeral Oration of Eguinarus Baro, whose Enemy he had been, if we believe Duaren (16). "Duarenus tantum juvenis (Balduini) gloriam non ferens, nunquam se Balduino æquum præbuit (17). ----- Duaren was so jealous of young Baudouin's Reputation, that he never was a Friend to him." I shall farther observe, that the Date of his Call to the Professorship of Bourges discovers a Mistake of Mr Bullart. He says, that This learned Man was gone to Geneva, to bear, from the Mouth of Calvin and Beza, the Reason, which had obliged them to forsake the Church of Rome (18). He acknowledges, that This Journey preceded the Time, wherein Baudouin was made Professor at Bourges. He ought, then, to grant, that Baudouin made it before the Year 1549, and consequently, when Beza was not yet a fit Person to be consulted on Those Matters. It is certain, I. That Beza was yet a Papist, and at Paris, when Baudouin cried up Calvin's and Bucer's Letters in all Companies (19). II. That Baudouin was gone from Geneva, before Beza went thither (20). This supplies us with a strong Proof of the Falshood, contained in these Words of Varillas (21): "Calvin, who pretended to raise him by the same Ways, that Beza had gained Repute in the Party, invited him to Geneva, received him in his House, admitted him into the Intrigues of the Consistory, and made use of him several Years as a Secretary. But, whether Baudouin's Humour was extremely sickle, as the Calvinists reproached him afterwards, or that he discovered, that Calvinism was but a refined Hypocrisy, as he declared in a satirical Apology; he went from Geneva to Heidelberg." Beza was not yet of the Protestant Religion, when Baudouin received so many Marks of Friendship from Calvin. Baudouin, after he had received Them, did not go to Heidelberg, but returned into France, and was seven Years Professor at Bourges. I confess, that, after This, He went again to Calvin at Geneva (22), but he did not stay long there; he suffered a severe Reprimand there, and testified his Repentance; he went soon after to Straßburg, by Calvin's Advice, and did not teach the Civil-Law at Heidelberg, 'till after he had taught it at Straßburg. "Quum illa Bituricensis conditio eum gravaret (offensatio enim, quæ sola pollet, evanuerat, ut ipse & votis minime satisfaceret) non dubitavit huc se recipere: & quum undique liberis eum convitiis exagitarint, qui prius amice fuerant, humanitèr à me impetrata venia admittus fuit. Feci

"quidem quod necesse erat, ut severa oburgatione correctus lapsus sui fœditatem agnosceret. Serviliter assensus est, & adulatoriè meis se consiliis regendum permisit. Argentinum profectus nomen dedit apud Pastorem & Seniores Gallicanæ Ecclesiæ (23). ----- Being displeased with his Situation at Bourges, which by no means answered his vain glorious Expectations, he made no Scruple of retiring thither; and, notwithstanding the Reproaches, which, on all sides, were cast on him by Those, who had formerly been his Friends, I received him kindly. By a severe Reproof, which was necessary, I brought him to acknowledge the Foulness of his Apostacy. He servilely complied, and flatteringly gave himself up to be governed by my Advice. Yet, going to Straßburg, he went over to the Pastor and Elders of the Gallican Church." Thus you see how Varillas informed himself of Things, which he pretended to speak of.

[C] He was sent for by Anthony de Bourbon, King of Navarre] Some say, that he was, then, in Lorraine, in the Retinue of Prince Casimir, Son of Frederick, Count Palatine (24). Others, that he was returned into France, with the Heir of the Count Palatine, who came to compliment Charles IX, on his Accession to the Crown (25). But all this does not so much as touch upon the Intrigue, which Beza mentions. He says, that, after the Death of Francis II, They, who feared to lose their Authority, in the Court of France, endeavoured chiefly to induce the King of Navarre to return back to the Romish Communion (26). They engaged him to send an Ambassador to the Court of Rome, in hopes either to recover his Kingdom, or to obtain Another from the Catholic King, by the Pope's good Offices. On the other hand, They gave him Hopes, by suborn'd Persons, that The Protestants of Germany might unite in his Favour, and assist him in recovering the Crown of Navarre; especially, if means could be found out to reconcile the Religions. They mentioned a Professor of Heidelberg to him, whose Name was Baudouin, who was a fit Person to negotiate such Matters. He sent for him into France; he conferred with him; and, judging him fit to find out the means of An Agreement in Religion, he set him to work; and, after some rough Draughts, prepared at Paris, he sent him back into Germany, and charged him, by Name, to consult with Cassander. This Intrigue, designed to break off the Conference of Poissy, did not effect it. The Ministers had already assembled there twice, when Baudouin returned with a Project of Union, printed at Basil (27). He was reprimanded for returning too late: He found, that the Bishop of Valencia, who had promised him a Professorship of Civil-Law, had changed his Mind. All, that he could obtain, was to be Preceptor to the King of Navarre's natural Son. He went to Paris, and gained Esteem by his Lectures, in which he joined Civil-Law with History; but he lost his Reputation on the Publication of the Book against the Treaty for a Reconciliation of Religions, which he had brought from Germany. He undertook to write against Calvin, in his own Defence; the Consequences of which we shall see below.

Varillas may be said, in the main, to confirm this Account of Beza. He says, that "Baudouin went from Geneva to Heidelberg, where he was Professor of the Civil-Law; 'till, Cassander having inspired him with the Desire of re-uniting all Religions, he thought it best to begin with France, where he expected to find the least Opposition. He came to Paris, where he communicated, to the Cardinal of Lorraine, the famous Consultation, which the same Cassander had drawn up for the Execution of his Project. The Cardinal received it with so much the more Joy, as he foresaw, that, though it should not produce all the Effect, which it's Author expected, yet it would, at least, set the Protestants at Variance, and divide the Ministers of the Assembly of Poissy, by the Overtures of Agreement, which it would suggest to the most moderate among them (28)." Varillas had said just be-standing, that Anthony was dead of a Wound, which he had received at the Siege of Rouen, he returned with his Pupil into France, and found his Estate and his Books plundered (g). He returned to his own Country, whither he was invited, to teach the Civil-Law in the University of Doüy [D]. He was promised great Advantages, fore, that, by this means, Baudouin became Preceptor to the King of Navarre's natural Son. He tells us, afterwards, how the Ministers got "clear of the "Difficulties, which Baudouin had thrown in their "Way. But, continues he (29), They would not have disentangled themselves so easily from Baudouin's second Difficulty, if Fortune had not favoured them. He had persuaded the Cardinal of Lorraine to send for the most famous Lutheran Professors of the Palatinate, and the Dutchy of Wirttemberg, to introduce them into the Conference, where, he was sure, they would be more zealous against the Calvinists, than against the Catholics; and that, by this means, besides the Pleasure of setting the Heretics together by the Ears, their Quarrels would make them ridiculous to the Court, where their Doctrine was before admired; and the People, who thought them uniform, understanding, that they had quarrelled among themselves, would so suddenly change the Esteem they had for them into Contempt, that no Frenchman would leave the Communion of the Church for the future. It must be confessed, that the Catholics never received more wholesome Advice, than This of Baudouin; and, if it had been put in practice with as much Diligence, as was requisite in so delicate an Intrigue, all the Evils, which the Conference of Poissy produced, afterwards, would have been prevented. And, indeed, the Ministers, who were not ignorant of their Adversaries most private Maxims, having discovered what Baudouin had proposed to their Disadvantage, were transported against him with all the Excess of Passion, which Indignation, Spite, Jealousy, and Fury, can inspire, when animated by a false Zeal, and hidden under so specious a Cover."

Note, That Varillas is mistaken, when he says, that Baudouin carried Cassander's Consultation to the Cardinal of Lorraine: For it was not made 'till three Years after (30). I shall give, below (31), the Title of The Work, which he carried, and shall observe (32), that he was employed to mediate an Ecclesiastical Agreement with the Prince of Condé.

[D] He was invited, to teach the Civil-Law in the University of Doüy.] The Marquis de Bergue, and several other great Lords of the Netherlands, engaged Maximilian de Bergue, Archbishop of Cambray, to manage matters so, that This Professorship of Civil-Law might be procured for Baudouin. They desired to make use of his Advice in Matters of State and Religion (33); for they knew his Opinion was, that the Laws against the Sectaries ought to be mitigated (34). "Nam Baldouin in ea erat sententia, ut veterem Edictorum severitatem leniendam profecturum, asserimaretque, retinere ea ratione Ecclesiam auctoritatem neque veteres consuevit, neque iis, quæ tunc erant, temporibus, posse (35). — For Baudouin was of such an Opinion, as to declare, that the ancient Severity of the Edicts ought to be mitigated, and to affirm, that Our Ancestors neither did, nor could, in those Times, support the Authority of the Church by such means." So that there is reason to believe, that he returned to Paris, because he would not be engaged, by the Duke of Alba, in the cruel Proceedings then in agitation. "Ac ne forte quæstor reis datus capitalibus sententiis provincialium suorum subscribere cogetur (36). — And last, by being appointed to enquire into the Guilt of the Accused, he should be obliged to join with those of his own Province, in pronouncing Sentence of Death on Them." The Male-contents of the Netherlands promised themselves great Things from his Counsels, since, besides the Principles, which I have already mentioned, he was a Person of great Address, and perfectly knew the World: "Ut in Belgium venit, magnam sui expectationem omnibus fecit. Solers animo, obsequendi gratia, & civilis congressus, nec minus officii comitate, ad ingenuum principum vitam instruxerat. Nec enim novorum hominum deliramenta sectabatur, & rursus in reititione serupulum oderat. Humanitque credebatur, iniquitatis temporum cedere, pietatisque integra-tem in paucis violare, quam vim adferre turbatis conscientias, quas in contaminatis hominibus nulla unquam supplicia eluunt (37). — Upon his Arrival in the Netherlands, great Expectations were raised of him. He was a compleat Courtier; he never gave into the Follies of Upstarts; nor was a Bigot to Religion. Besides which, he thought it more becoming a Man to give way a little to the Iniquity of the Times, and rather to recede from the strict Laws of Piety in a few Instances, than to offer Violence to disturbed Consciences, which, in Persons infected with them, no Punishment can ever wash out." The Author, whom I quote, had observed, that Baudouin had been very well known to Lewis of Nassau, at Heidelberg. The third Apology of This Civilian informs us, that the Prince of Nassau, who had been his Auditor at Strasbourg, had lately cared him much in the Netherlands (38). Let us add to this, that he was esteemed by William, Prince of Orange. "Francisco Baldouin, jurisconsulto egregio, pacis Ecclesiasticæ studio, magni facti à Principe Arausfortensi Wilhelmo, aliisque Belgarum proceribus, qui & opera ejus usi sunt, cur credi non debeat, nihil caute est (39). — I see no reason, why we should not give Credit to Francis Baudouin, an excellent Civilian, who studied the Peace of the Church, and was highly esteemed by William, Prince of Orange, and others of the Nobility in the Low-Countries." It is Grotius, who says this, and who affirms, that That Prince, and other great Lords of the Netherlands, consulted Baudouin. It was in their first Proceedings against Spain. He was present in the first Assemblies of Breda; and they employed him to draw up the Writing, in which they demanded, of the Dukes of Parma, the free Exercise of their Religion. He shewed, that Religion cannot subsist without an Outward Exercise, and that it requires This, as a necessary Support, and Nourishment (40). The Author, who informs me of this, observes, that Baudouin had been recalled from his Exile, by the Archbishop of Arras. Ab exilio per Archiepiscopum Arrebatensium (it should be Atrebatensem) revocatus (41). To understand This, The Reader must know, that, finding himself accused of Heresy, he left his Country, and that, after his Flight, a Sentence of Proscription was pronounced against him (42). It was revoked, when they recalled him, in order to consult with him on the State of Affairs in the Netherlands. Note, that the Author, who speaks of the Archbishop of Arras, does not relate the Thing, as he ought: The Chronicle of John Francis le Petit, to which he refers, will tell us the Circumstances of it better: "Francis Baudouin — having before been banished from Arras for his Religion, was sent for by the said Lord, Prince of Orange, from France, to consult him on the Difficulties, which then occurred; who, after his Banishment, was revoked by the Chamber of Artois, at the Instance of the Archbishop of Cambray, went to the said Prince, in the City of Brussels; where, having conferred with him, and the other above-mentioned Lords, he drew up a Discourse, in the Form of a Proposal, concerning the Then Religious Troubles, which was sent to the King of Spain, directed to his own Person, wherein are contained the true Means of preventing all Insurrections, and extirpating Sects, and Heresies (43)." This Discourse is preserved entire, in the Chronicle of John Francis le Petit. It is solid, and very judicious. This Chronicle says, that "Baudouin luckily hit upon the true Remedy of the Troubles, which the King, and his Council, might, of late, have known to be so."

Let us remark, by the way, that the Writers, who speak of him, are in the wrong to say, that from the Netherlands he went to Paris. They should have said, that he did not go to Paris, till he had fled to Geneva, where he embraced the Protestant Religion (44). He boasted, that, for the Profession of the Gospel, he had suffered Exile, and the loss of all he had; but some affirm, that his Mother sent him all that he could pretend to of his Patrimo-

Advantages, and was very courteously received by the Duke of Alba, on the Eve of That Day that Count Egmont was imprisoned: but, fearing to be chosen one of the Judges of Those Persons, whom they had a mind to put to Death, he desired leave to be absent for some Days, under pretence of fetching his Wife, and his Library; and, having obtained it, he returned to Paris, where he stayed. He read there public Lectures on some Parts of the Pandeſts, with the Applause of a Crowd of Auditors (b). He accepted the Professorship of Civil-Law, which was offered him by the University of Bezanſon; but, understanding at his coming there, that the Emperor Maximilian had forbid That University to erect This Professorship, he would read no Lectures there, though he was solicited to do it. He returned to Paris, where he followed the Advice of Philip de Hurault (i), which was, to teach the Civil-Law in the University of Angers. This He did near four Years, and till the Duke of Anjou, who was proclaimed King of Poland, sent for him to Paris, at the time, when the Polish Embassy was received there [E] (k). He was designed for the Professorship of Civil-Law in the University of

ny. "Fortunis exutum fuisse negant contreranei & familiares: quia extra Cæsaris ditionem à matre & coheredibus permiffum fuit sumere quantum ex hæreditate, si integra fuisset ejus conditio, pervenire ad eum poterat: ut ne quidem assis iacturam fecerit. Et aliquando coram homini gratulatus sum, quod tam facile recuperasset, quod sibi credidat perissile (45). ----- His Countrymen and Acquaintance deny, that he was stripped of his Fortunes; since, when he was out of the Emperor's Power, his Mother, and Co-heirs, allowed him to take as much of his Patrimony as he could have claimed, bad it remained entire; so that he did not lose a single Farthing: And I myself have personally congratulated him upon the easy Recovery of what he looked upon as lost." Observe, pray, a want of Exactness in Papyrius Masso. He says nothing of the Journey, which our Baudouin took into the Netherlands, at the Solicitation of the great Lords, who would remedy the Disorders, which The too great Severity of the Penal Laws, against the Sectaries, produced daily. He speaks only of a Journey taken, during the Government of the Duke of Alba. This is to forget the principal Thing, and to reduce the Affair to but a small part of it. What I have quoted from Valerius Andreas, Nicolas Burgundius, and several others, and which is a very considerable Part of Baudouin's Life, ought to be referred to the Year 1564, under the Government of the Duchess of Parma. It was in That Year, that Cassander and Baudouin were consulted by the Malecontents. The one, viz. Cassander, was named by the Count de Horn, and the other by Count Lewis of Nassau (46). It was believed, that These two Men were capable of accommodating the Differences of Religion. The Prince of Orange promised great things to Francis Baudouin, and not only designed to procure him a Professorship of Civil-Law, in the University of Louvain, or in That of Duëny, but also a Seat in the Privy-Council. Baudouin, returning into France, with a Promise to come back again into the Netherlands, at a proper Time, received many Presents from That Prince. Count Lewis of Nassau pressed him several times to keep his Word, and endeavoured to dazzle him with the Splendor of Dignities: Imminetium Honorum blanditiis allicere (47). But Baudouin thought he should not find his Account in the Business he had promised to undertake; all his Friends advised him not to concern himself in it, and he was in hopes of a better Reward for the Pains he took to reconcile the Bourbons with the Guises (48). These are Particulars, which deserved to have been touched upon by Papyrius Masso; and yet he has not said a Word of them; but, instead thereof, tells us, That the Spaniards offered him the Professorship of Civil-Law, in the University of Duëny; that They promised him a yearly Pension of Six thousand Florins, and a share of Fifty thousand Florins, in the Confiscation of the Estates of Those, who should be proscribed; and that The Duke of Alba received him civilly, &c. It would appear very strange, that the Spaniards should honour a Man in this manner, who had favoured the Prince of Orange's Designs, if we did not remember Baudouin's Inconstancy, I mean, his extreme Readiness at changing Sides. The Historian, whom I quote, having mentioned a fine Discourse of the Prince of Orange, adds, that it was the Fruit of Baudouin's Conversations. "Nemini mirum videri debet, tan-tam in illo principe eluxisse cognitionem Philosphie; ex Baldouini colloquiis hauserat (49). ----- "No One ought to think it strange, that This Prince discovered so great a Knowledge of Philosophy; he acquired it by conversing with Boudouin."

I shall observe, in another Place (50), what he did in relation to the Massacre of Paris.

[E] The Duke of Anjou ----- sent for him to Paris, at the time, when the Polish Embassy was received there.] Baudouin was This Prince's Master of the Requests (51): He gained the Favour of the Polish Embassadors, by conversing with Them, and published a Discourse de Legatione Polonica, dedicated to John Zamorski (52); it is thought he would have gone into Poland, the Spring following, if he had not died. This is all that Papyrius Masso tells us of the Matter. Let us, therefore, look upon most of what is related by Mr Bullart, as fabulous Hyperboles. "It was, says he (53), during Baudouin's Abode at Angers, that the Polish Lords, who came to offer Their Crown to Henry, Duke of Anjou, arrived in France. A Person of Ability was wanting, to receive This sumptuous Embassy, and to answer it. It was a material Point to return Thanks for This Offer, without depressing the Royal Dignity that was offered: It was requisite to speak both like a King, and a grateful Man. No Person in France was found better qualified to undertake this, than the prudent BAUDOUIN. The Duke of Anjou having sent for him to Paris, This great Man appeared in the Halls of the Louvre among the chief Persons of the State: He was Interpreter to That famous Embassy: He was no less applauded for the Excellency of his Answer, than the famous Zamorski for That of his Speech; and he made himself so considerable to Those Illustrious Embassadors, that it was resolved to send him into Poland to settle That Crown on the Head of the new King, and to dispose That Nation to receive him; but his last Sickness, which seized him at the same time, deprived him of That Honour, and the Duke of Anjou of the Hopes he had of re-establishing the Unity of Cracow by his Means." Nothing could happen more glorious, than This, to a Professor of Angers: How comes it then, that one of his best Friends does not mention it, in the Elogy, which He consecrated to him? No good reason can be assigned for it, unless we say, that it is false; for it is against all probability, that he should be ignorant of such a thing, if it really happened. Writers of Elogies may be permitted to make use of a more figurative, and flattering, Language, than Historians; but neither Lying, nor Amplifications, such as change the Nature of an Adventure, ought any more to be allowed Them, than Historians; so that it may be said, that Mr Bullart is guilty of an inexcusable Excess. Thuanus, who has exactly related what concerned the Polish Embassadors, their Speeches, and the Answers, which were made to them, says nothing of our Baudouin (54). It is always the Bishop of Posnania, who speaks, and a Chancellor, who answers him: Birague, Chancellor of France, replied, when They harangued Charles IX. Cbiaverni, Chancellor of the Duke of Anjou, returned an Answer, when They harangued This Duke, and when They read to him the Act of his Election. If any other speaks besides, it is, Nicolas Christopher Radzievili, on the Polish Side (55), and Paul de Foix, for Cracow (1), and it is thought he would have followed the new King into That Country, if Death hath not prevented him. He died in the Arms of his only Daughter [F], in the College of Arras, at Paris, the Twenty fourth of October, 1573 (m) [G]. This is the Sum of what Papyrius Masso, Valerius Andreas, Aubertus Miræus, Bullart, and several others, relate of him. It is very strange, that they should so boldly suppress all that relates to his changing of his Religion (n). One can hardly infer from their Narratives, that he lived once in the Protestant Communion. Moreri has, either through Ignorance, or Dissimulation, omitted the same Things. But, in requital, he enlarges on the Quarrel between Calvin and Baudouin. It was a very sharp one [H]. Beza came into it with a little too much

Charles IX (56). My Remark would be of less weight, if Thuanus had made no manner of mention either of Zamoski, or Baudouin. But we find, that he speaks of them both; and after this Manner: He says, That Speech of Zamoski was printed; but that it was not known, whether it had been spoken; In eandem rem edita, an habita sit incertum, Oratio luculenta a Joanne Zario Zamoscio (57); and he adds, that Baudouin caused another Speech to be printed, addressed to Zamoski. Is not This plainly giving us to understand, that Baudouin was not chosen to interpret That Poland's Speech, and to answer it in the Presence of the whole Court? What can be stronger against Mr Bullart's Narrative?

[F] He died in the Arms of his only Daughter.] Her Name was Catherine. She was twice married; "her first Husband was John de Sauzay, Sieur de Sainte Ouanne, in Poitou; and her second Husband was Adam le Changeur, Sieur du Coteau, in Berri (58)." She was born at Heidelberg (59). Her Mother's Name was Catherine Biton; and was of Bourges. She was the Widow of Philip Labbé, Great Grand-father of Father Labbé a Jesuit, when she married Baudouin (60). She had some Children by her first Husband, who, with their Grand-mother, were ruined by their Step-father, as Calvin relates it.

Our Civilian was more desirous to leave a Daughter behind him, than a Son, because he feared Cicero's Destiny, whose Son inherited nothing of his Father's Eloquence. Percontanti mihi malletne filium, quam filium habere, minime (62) inquit, Roma enim Ciceronis filium non agnoscebat loquentem (63).

Thuanus places his Death on the eleventh of November 1573; Mr Menage on the Twenty fourth of October 1574; and yet he makes him but Fifty three Years, nine Months, and Twenty four Days, old, though he had placed his Birth on the first of January 1520. These two Faults proceeded from la Croix du Maine.

(64) In Remark [C].

[H] The Quarrel between Calvin and Baudouin was very sharp.] I mentioned the Origin of it (64), when I said, that Francis Baudouin dispersed a little Book concerning a Re-union of Religions, whilst the Conference of Poissy was held. It was an anonymous Latin Discourse, composed by Cassander, and intitled, De officio pii ac publice tranquillitatis vere amanti viri in hoc religionis dissidio. When it was known at Geneva, that Baudouin designed to prejudice the Reformed by This little Book, it was thought proper to lay him open to the Public. For which reason, Calvin, in refuting This Piece, which he imputed to Baudouin, lashed him severely. His Refutation is intitled, "Responsio ad versipellum quendam mediatorum, qui pacificandi specie rectum Evangelium cursum in Gallia abruptere molitus est. — An Answer to a certain turn-coat Mediator, who has endeavoured to break off the right Course of the Gospel in France." It is in the Volume of Calvin's Opuscula, pag. 351, and the following. Baudouin defended himself, by publishing a Work, for which he had obtained a Licence in the Year 1557: he revised it, and added an Appendix to it (65). In a word, it was His Ad leges de famosis libellis & de calumniaribus commentarius, printed, at Paris, by Jacques Maitre, in the Year 1562, in 4to. Calvin's Reply appeared in the Field soon after with a strong Reinforcement (66); for it was accompanied with several Pieces composed by good Pens; besides which, They published The Letters, which This Deserter had written at several times to Calvin. "Respondit quoque Joannes Crispinus ejus contreraneus, & perpetuus, quoad ejus fieri potuit, amicus. Ad-juncta sunt quorundam infignium virorum scripta, quibus perpetua istius improbitas, summa impudentia, & extrema infestia ita manifestè redarguitur, ut ne nunc quidem possit ignorantiam suam diffiniri. Additæ sunt denique ipsius literæ variis temporibus ad Calvinum scriptæ, ut horrenda illa defectio, ipsius apostatæ testimonio, apud omnes bonos sanciretur (67). — Johannes Crispinus, likewise, his Countryman, and, as far as he could be so, his Friend, answered him. There were added, likewise, Pieces by some of the best Hands, in which his perpetual Dishonesty, consummate Impudence, and extreme Ignorance, are undeniably proved. Lastly there were added His Letters, written at different Times to Calvin, as a Satisfaction to all good Men of his horrid Apostacy." The Nature of this Collection will be more exactly known, if I give the Title of it here; which is This: "Joannis Calvinii responsio ad Balduini convicia. Ad leges de transugis, desertoribus & emanoribus, Francisci Balduini epistolæ quædam ad Joannem Calvinum pro Commentariis. Francisci Duareni J. C. ad alterum quendam Jurific. epistola, de Francisco Balduino. Antonii Contii J. C. admonitio de falsis Constantini legibus, ad quendam, qui se hoc tempore Jurisconsultum Christianum profectetur. Some Epistles of Francis Baudouin to John Calvin, by way of Commentaries on the Laws relating to Desertors, and Vagabonds. An Epistle of Francis Duarens J. C. to another Civilian, concerning Francis Baudouin. An Advertisement of Anthony Contius J. C. concerning the Spurious Laws of Constantine, to one, who, at this time, professes himself a Christian Lawyer. Of the Duty, to be observed, both in Religion, and Writings, An Epistle to Francis Baudouin, the Civilian. The Commentary of Joannes Crispinus on the III. C. Imperial Law, concerning Apostates, addressed to the Civilian." This Collection, containing an Hundred and seventeen Pages, was printed in the Year 1562, in 4to. Baudouin composed a second Answer, which was printed at Paris, and at Cologne, in the Year 1562. Calvin, not thinking fit to refute it, published a Piece, of but One Page, wherein he informed the Public, that he would Answer This Adversary no more (68). It is there, that he reproaches him with having violated the Laws of Hospitality, by stealing some Papers, which might be of Service to him in his perfidious Attempts. "Antequam respondeo, says he (69), monendi sunt lectores nihil hac monedula esse furacius, ut hac parte fratrem suum patruelum Antonium Balduinum superet, cui ob surandi solertiam, cognomen Ablativi à condiculis inditum fuit. Tanta fuit mea erga ipsum facilitas, ut quicquid erat in bibliotheca mea chartarum liberè, me absente, excussisset. much bitterness, even in the Opinion of several of his own Party [I]. It cannot be denied, that Baudouin was of a very inconstant, and fantastical, Humour. He

"doin, who, for his cunning in thieving, was nicknamed by his School-fellows The Ablative. He had such easy access to me, that, in my Absence, he had the Liberty of turning over all the Papers in my Library. That he pilfered what might be of Use to him, is evident from his Writings, in which he has finely betrayed himself. Here his Fidelity, and Obedience of the Laws of Hospitality, plainly appear." Beza supplied his Place, and replied to Baudouin's second Piece, who speedily published a third Apology against them. It appeared in the Year 1564, and the Title of it is, "Pro Fr. Balduino responsio ad Calvinum & Bezam, cum refutatione Calvini de scriptura & traditione (71). -----

"An Apology for Francis Baudouin, and a Confutation of Calvin concerning Scripture and Tradition." The Preface, which Baudouin composed on Optatus, in the Year 1563, may be counted for the fourth Piece. It was translated out of Latin into French by Peter Veil, who prefixed it to his French Translation of Optatus, printed at Paris, in the Year 1564. This Account affords us Matter for Censuring a Protestant Writer. He mentions the Intrigues relating to the Writing of Cassander, and adds, that Baudouin, not having been called by the Catholics, nor by the Reformed, to the Conference of Poissy, discharged all his Spleen against the Ministers, and published some Libels against Calvin, and Beza, and that They answered him. Publicis scriptis infestatus est Calvinum & Bezam, qui edito responso ad illius probra respondent, & illum mendacis, perfidæ, atque impietatis reum esse infinitum demonstrare (72). This is to declare him the Aggressor; which is false: So that This Author is not as faithful, and exact, as he should have been.

[I] Beza came into it with a little too much bitterness, even in the Opinion of several of his own Party.] The Piece, which he published concerning it, is in the second Volume of his Works (73). Here is a small Extract of the Letter, which Sainte Aldegonde wrote to him in the Year 1566. "Statueram præterea certiores facere te quàm hic finisrè plerique interpretentur libellos isthuc ultro citroque tum in Balduinum tum in Heshufum scriptos, ex eoque homines malevolos gravem Evangelicæ veritati conciliare invidiam. Sed quoniam auidi te harum rerum ab aliis esse factum certiores, volui ab hoc argumento superfedere. Rogo tamen, observande in Christo parens, ut vel in harum regionum gratiam, in quibus non modo cum hypocritis eo nomine nobis est colluctandum, verumetiam ab apertis hostibus gravia multa perpetienda, (qui suam tyrannidem in contentiones nostras derivant) non graves stylium quàm modestissimè in Evangelicæ veritatis Apostatas ac adversarios temperare. Non quidem quod parcendum illis censeam, qui nullum non lapidem movent, quò nos in invidiam graviores vocent, sed ne (dum illis pro merito respondeatur) quod suis illi vanissimis erga nos maledictis atque calumniis nequeunt consequi) nempe ut Evangelii lucem obruant, ejusque sectatores apertis veritatis hostibus exarnificandis tradant) id ipsum nostris, etsi justissimis ac verissimis, non tamen, ut plerique existimant, Evangelica mansuetudine dignis, vel accusationibus, vel responsionibus, adeptos se esse gloriantur. Id si feceris, uti omnino statuisse te audio, & nos magna invidia levaris, & illis ipsis perfidis Apostatis turpem maledicentiæ notam innotum reliqueris. Itaque ut facias, vehementer hic omnes Evangelii studiosi (qui te plerique ut parentem amant & colunt, reverenturque ut Præceptorem) etiam atque etiam te rogant (74). —

"I had determined likewise to have informed you of the Misconstructions, which several here put upon the Pieces written on both Sides, both against Baudouin, and Heshufius, and that ill-disposed Persons excused from hence a Prejudice against The Gospel-Truth. But, bearing, that you are already acquainted with it, I thought I might be dispensed with from entering upon this Subject. Yet, O venerable Father in CHRIST, I intreat you, for the Sake of This Country, in which we are, not only necessitated to contend with Hypocrites, as such, but have many Evils to suffer from professed Enemies, who impute their own Tyranny to Our Divisions, that you would be pleased to temper the Keenness of your Style, and write with as much Moderation, as possible, against Apostates, and the Enemies of the Christian Faith. Not that I think they deserve to be spared, who leave no Stone unturned to increase the Odium against us; but least, by answering them as They deserve, we should give them an Opportunity of boasting to have obtained That, by Our Accusations, or Answers (which, though ever so just, and true, are, by many, thought not worthy of the Gospel Mildness) which They cannot effect by their ill-grounded Calumnies and Reproaches; I mean, The Extinction of the Gospel-Light, and The Persecution of its Followers by the avowed Enemies of Truth. If you do This, as I hear you have determined to do, you will both free us from a great Odium, and leave the shameful Brand of Calumny on These perfidious Apostates. This All, who are Lovers of the Gospel, here, most earnestly intreat of you, whom They Love and Honour as a Father, and revere as a Teacher." It appears from these Words, I. That other Person had already informed Beza of the Prejudice, which the passionate Writings, that had appeared against Baudouin, did to the Reformed. Ill-disposed Persons took an Occasion from them to render the Reformation odious. II. That he was most humbly desired, for the future, to take off the Edge of his too sharp Pen, if it were only in Favour of the Reformed of the Netherlands, who had, on this Occasion, not only the Hypocrites (75), but also declared and violent Enemies, to deal with. III. That it was to be feared, that True and most just Answers, but void of Christian Meekness, would accomplish That, which The Impudence of Calumniators endeavoured in vain to effect, viz. That The Light of Truth should be extinguished, and its Professors suffer a cruel Persecution. IV. That, if Beza condescended to This Advice, as it was said he was resolved to do, he would free the Church of Christ from a great Odium, and the Apostates would remain branded with Calumny. He answered Sainte Aldegonde, That, if He alone had been abused, he should no more have been moved at it, than if he had heard a Dog bark in the Indies: But, Religion being concerned in it, he thought he was obliged to treat The Infamous Apostate, who had calumniated it, according to his Desert; and that he regarded but little the Scruples of moderate Men. The impudent Lies of That Calumniator, says he, must affect me as much, as the Vigor of Our Replies. Every One may see, that it is necessary I should set down his own Words; for many may imagine, I pervert the Sense of them. Here they are: "Supereft ut ad extremam tuam Epistolam paucis respondeam. Balduinum & Heshufium nonnulli vellent moderatius à me fuisse reprehensos. Ego verò cuperem istos æquè affici impudentissimis eorum conviciis in homines innoxios contortis, ac iustis nostris defensionibus. Quid non enim in optimum illud & innocentissimum Dei servum jaculatus esse fœdus ille Apostata? in me verò quid non dixit? Et tamen Deus mihi testis est in animam meam, non multò magis me, si res mea privata ageretur, ista petulantia commoveri potuiffet, quàm si in his regionibus verfans audiviffem canes in India latrare. Sed quum per nostrum latus viderem Gallicas omnes Ecclesias ab isto conductio rabula confodi, & tanquam seditiosos accusari, quocunque istorum latronum telis corpora sua non objecerunt, ut facere necesse fuit, nisi & Christi causam & regiam majestatem prodere maluiffent, peccavi scilicet, quod ejus calumniis se respondi, ut & ipsum sycophantam suis coloribus depingerem, & causæ nostræ bonitatem probarem. Itaque quod ad illum attinet, non dissimulo me nullum peccatum agnoscere, & moderatos istos nihil morari. De Heshufio, quoniam aliud argumentum tractabam, lateor causam illam potuiffet aliter agi. Sed singularis illa infusio hominis & inficitia & audacia in hos veluti scopulos me adegit, ubi tamen spero me naufragium non fecisse (76). — It remains only to answer your last Letter in few Words. There are, who could wish I had reproved Baudouin and Heshufius with more Moderation. And I cannot help wishing, these Persons were equally affected with the impudent Calumnies They have vented against innocent Persons, as with My Just Defence. For what has not This base Apostate

He was, with respect to Universities, what certain Persons are in relation to Mistresses, who run from one Fair to Another, and from Shore to Shore in the Sea of Love. It is very probable, that, when he lived at Bourges, in the Romish Communion, he had more affection for the Protestants, than when he communicated with Them at Heidelberg. It may also be suspected, that he neither liked Popery, nor Calvinism, nor Lutheranism, and that he would have new-modelled Them, and perhaps many other Sects, to form A New One out of Them. What is certain, is, that he aimed at a Re-union of Religions (o). On the other hand, it cannot be denied, that he had very fine Parts, an Extensive Knowledge (p), an admirable Memory, and an Eloquence so much the more persuasive, as he was a handsome Man (q), and had a strong, and pleasing, Voice (r). We are not to think, therefore, that there is any exaggeration in what has been said of his

I shall make but two Reflexions on This Answer. In the first place, it is undeniable, that Readers give some reason to believe, that they are more offended at the Bitterness of an Apologist, than at That of the Aggressor. Let a Writer defame all the World, the Dead, the Living, Sovereigns, Subjects, his Brethren in Religion, The Adversaries of his Party; let him exercise This Trade several Years successively, and become more malicious, and satirical, as he grows old; I confess, that The Readers perceive it, and blame him for it: but if, at last, This Man happens to be very ill treated by Those, whom he has provoked, you will hear an hundred times more Complaints against Them, than against Him. His very Enemies think it strange, that he was not treated with more Moderation. They have read, with pleasure, what was published to his Disadvantage; and yet they will not stick to say, that he ought to have been spared. This is an Effect of the immoderate Inclination Men have for censuring others. Some People are pleased to approve of nothing. But let us not judge of of those Moderate Persons, whose Opinion is mentioned by St Aldegonde. Doubtless, They were yet more offended at the satirical Audaciousness of Baudouin, than at the Invectives of those, who confused him; but they could have wished, that slandering had been the Character of the Enemies of the True Religion, and that They, who defended it, had distinguished themselves by Wisdom, and a moderate Style. They hated a satirical Disposition, which mixes Defamation with Reason, in which Personal Injuries predominate; and They could not detest it without some uneasiness, whilst it was common to their Enemies, and their Friends. Wherefore, They wished, as well for This, as for some other Reasons, that it were one of the distinguishing Characters of the Catholic Writers, and that the Protestants would not, by adopting it themselves, free them from this Brand of Infamy. I observe, in the second place, That Beza indulged his Imagination too far; for, if the Book, which he wrote against Baudouin, were the only One left us, we should not only take This Civilian for a most infamous Rascal, but also for an Author without any Wit, Learning, or Merit. He has, therefore, given a deceitful Description of him; since it cannot be denied by those, who have read what Baudouin has written, and what others have said of him, that he was a Man of very great Parts. An Author may be excused, on account of the Infirmary of Human Nature for not allowing his Enemy to be Learned, Eloquent, and Ingenious. But, if he be permitted to conceal These Truths, he ought, at least, to abstain from denying Them. The Passion, which an Author shews, in the Works, he composes against the Enemies of his Religion, may proceed, sometimes, from a great Zeal; wherefore it must be said, that Anger is equivocal between Temper, and Devotion. But I cannot see, how the Haughtiness of a Writer can be reduced to an Evangelical Principle. I call Haughtiness the Contempt he expresses for his Adversary, and the Affectation of treating him as the most wretched of Authors; though the contrary be notoriously true, and is evident from his Employments, and Writings. I could wish not to have found, in the History of the Reformed Churches, that Baudouin died a wretched Pedant (77). Such an Expression ought not to have fallen from the Pen of Beza, who was then Professor of Divinity, and formerly Professor of Greek. He should have left so unpolite, and contemptuous, a Way of treating Those, who instruct Youth, to the Gentlemen of the Sword. He should not have affronted a Profession, which was of the same kind with his own. If it be said, that he did not place Baudouin's Pedantry in his being a Professor, but in his personal Defects, this is to say nothing at all; since This Civilian did not want Politeness, and knew how to converse with great Men, and enter into their Intrigues (78). An eager Desire of treating him with Contempt induced Beza to say, that, when he was propoled to the King of Navarre, in 1561, to be employed by him, That Prince did not know, that there was such a Person, as Baudouin, in the World (79). This is one of Those Things, which Authors advance at Random, and which they cannot justify afterwards. Baudouin affirms, that he was recommended to That Prince by the Queen of Navarre (80), to whom he had the Honour to pay his Duty, on the Wedding-day of That Queen's Daughter with That Prince (81). He affirms, that the Favour, and Good-will, of This Princess confirmed the Choice, which was made of him, for the Professorship of Civil Law, at Bourges. This is very probable; for, as she was Duchess of Berry, and promoted the Interest of Learning, there was no attaining to any Preferment in That University without her Concurrence. How was it possible for Beza to confute Francis Baudouin, on This Point? Some will, perhaps, say, that Zeal for Religion sometimes induces Divines to treat a Man, whom they refuse, with the greatest Contempt, and as a wretched Author; for They think it expedient for the good of the True Church, that her Sons should be persuaded, that none but ignorant Men oppose her. I answer, that a Zeal, which should occasion a Conduct, so contrary to Sincerity, Reason, and Justice, and yet more to the strict Morality of JESUS CHRIST, can never pass but for a very blind Zeal. I will not mention the Inconveniences of such a Conduct. It may be said to such Men; You may easily defend your Cause, since you acknowledge, that it is so weakly attacked; your Triumphs are no fight, that you fight for the Truth.

I must make yet another Observation. Sainte Aldegonde did not give all the necessary Advice; he forgot one, which was very material: He did not advise the returning an Answer to Baudouin's Third Apology. I know, that, in Matters of Right, a Man need not be so nice, as to leave none of his Adversary's Works unanswered. In a second Reply, Things may be set in the best Light, which can be given them; and, then, a Man may promise himself, that the intelligent Reader will not think it strange, if he does not enter the Lists again: But, in Matters of Fact, relating to personal and defamatory Accusations, the Aggressor must never be silent first; for, if he does not reply to the Apologies of The Accused, it is a Sign, that he wants Proofs, and that he is forced to stop at the Opposition of a meer Negative. Baudouin's Third Answer is full of giving the Lye, and recriminating; and contains some Facts in Vindication of himself; so that Beza ought not to have left it unanswered; he should have been put in mind to support his first Reply by a new Piece in Justification of the former. In these kind of Quarrels, He, who quits the Field, loses the Battle; Both Plaintiff and Defendant are obliged to answer every new Reason, alledged against them, tho' they were to publish twenty Cafes in their own Defence. Take notice of the Epithet new, which I make use of; for, if the Accuser, for example, or his Friends for him, should multiply Writings continually, repeating the same Things, only with some small Alterations as to the Form, and never answering either the Matters of Fact, or the Reasons of the Accused, the latter may keep a profound Silence; his first Apology is sufficient, 'till, among the Multitude of Cafes, published by his Adversary, One be found, containing something new.

[K] What has been said of his Auditory.] Bishops, Counsellors, and Gentlemen of the Sword, appeared there. Sammartbanus affirms This, as having seen it. "Homo, says he (82), facundissimus, iploque oris ac totius corporis habitu non iniquum, ex historiariarum & civilis disciplinæ conjunctione, suis prædicationibus gratiam & venerem aerebat. Ac cum quidem sæpe vidimus hoc splendidi summe doctrinæ apparatus, Lutetiae profitemem, cum ad ejus auditorium permulti primæ notæ homines, episcopi, senatores, equites, libenter & maxima frequentia confluerent. ----- He was a most eloquent Man, of a pleasing Aspect and Deportment; and set off his Lectures by a Mixture of History and Civil Law. I have seen him often, with this splendid Equipage of Learning, in the Professor's Chair at Paris, attended by many Persons of the first Rank, Bishops, Senators, and Gentlemen of the Army, who crowded to hear him."

[K] He was no Colleague of Cujacius, as some affirm.] Beza is one of them. "It is a shameful thing for you, says he to him, to reflect upon Calvin, as being of an Humor incompatible with others, naturæ axiosum; for you have rendered yourself intolerable to all your Colleagues, wherever you came. If you deny it, Duaren, le Conte, Cujacius, Hotman, &c. will convict you of the contrary (83)." Baudouin replied, that Cujacius was his Successor at Bourges, but not his Colleague, and that They had never seen each other. "Cujacius Balduino in ea Schola successit: collega nunquam fuit, imo alter alterum nunquam vidit. Per literas aliquando collocuti sunt, sed tam amice ut nihil magis. Imo Cujacius Balduino rogavit in illud suum collegium ut rediret. Si nobis non credis, Cujacium interrogato (84). ----- Cujacius succeeded Baudouin in That School: he was never his Colleague; nay, They never saw each other. They corresponded sometimes by Letter, but with the utmost Friendliness. Cujacius even entreated Baudouin to return to his College. If you do not believe me, ask Cujacius himself."

[M] I shall say something concerning his Writings, and his being accused of Plagiarism.] In his Twenty third Year, he commenced Author: for, in 1542, he published, at Louvain, Leges de re rustica, item Novella Constitutio prima de hereditibus & lege Falcidia Justiniani, which he had translated from the Greek, and accompanied with a Commentary (85). This was reprinted, the following Year, at Basl (86), by Oporinus, with a large Book of Anthony Garrou. In 1545, he published, at Paris, Prolegomena de Jure Civili; and, in 1546, Commentarii in libros 18. Institut. Juris Civilis Justiniani Imperatoris. His Commentary on the Laws of the twelve Tables was printed several Times. The third Edition is of Basl, 1557, in 8vo, by Oporinus, who printed, at the same time, his Juris Civilis Catechesis, and his Commentary ad Edicta veterum Principum Romanorum de Christianis, a Work, wherein he maintains Toleration, and which, for That Reason, was censured by Claude de Saintes (87). I omit several other Books of Civil Law, published by This Author. But the following Particular must not be omitted: I find in Mr Menage, that, "At the Request of the Prince of Condé, he wrote a Treatise of the means of attaining to a good Reformation in Religion. This Treatise having been published by a Carmelite, who had left his Order, and who added much of his own to it, Baudouin complained of This Proceeding to the Prince of Condé. The Prince banished The Monk from his Court, and gave Baudouin leave to defend himself. On this Permission, Baudouin wrote his Advice on the Reformation of the Church, in Latin, and afterwards in French: and his Answer to a Preaching Calumniation, in French (88)." In Baudouin's Third Answer, it appears, that, by order of the Queen-Mother, he went to see the Prince of Condé in Prison, and conferred with him about the reconciling of Religions, and that he was commanded to write a Book concerning This Conference, which was renewed after That Prince was set at Liberty. The composing of This Work hindered him from carrying a Letter to the Duke of Guise (89). Neither ought I to forget, that his Constantinus, sive de legibus Constantini Imperatoris, printed at Basl, in the Year 1556, was put in the Index Librorum expurgandorum, and that he passed for the Author of a Book, which was printed at Strasbourg, Sub Christianorum Jurisconsultorum nomine contra Duarenum, in the Year 1556; but he disowned it (90). In Gesner's Epitome, Another Work is ascribed to him, which belongs to Another Baudouin; Non bujus, sed Petri Baldouini, sunt (91). It is Notes on Tully's Offices. It was He, who translated an History of Poland into French, written, in Latin, by John Herbut of Fultin, Cassellan of Sanez. This French Translation was printed at Paris, in 4to, without the Translator's Name (92). He disguised himself sometimes under the Name of Peter de la Roche, Petrus Rochius (93), and called himself Atrebatius, by way of allusion to J.C. Trebatius and to his Country (94).

As for the Plagiarism, which was laid to his Charge, read what follows. "Pudendum est, & nimium illiberalis illud plagium, quod ipse insciarius non potest, de annotationibus in Justiniani Institutiones. Brethano præceptoris suo surreptis. Omitto quæ non modo Ferretus & Othomanus, quorum fortassis familiaritate tum abutebatur ex veteri illa formula τὴ τῶν φίλων καὶ αὐτῶν, sed etiam maximi ipsius inimici Baro, & Duarenus, optimo jure ex illius centonibus repetunt. Omitto etiam turpissimorum errorum Centurias, quas Contius & ipse Juris interpres in istius Constantino, quamvis exiguolibello, annotavit (95). ----- He cannot deny That Ungenerous Plagiarism, in his Annotations on Justinian's Institutes, which he stole from his Master Brethanus. I omit what not only Ferretus, and Othomanus, whose Friendship perhaps he abused, from that old Maxim, that among Friends All Things are common, but what even his greatest Enemies, Baro and Duaren, have a just claim to, in his Cento's. I omit, likewise, the Centuriæ of most scandalous Errors, which Contius, who was himself an Interpreter of Law, remarked in his Constantine." That Contius, mentioned by Beza, was Professor of Civil Law at Bourges, and was called Antony le Conte. Hotman is also mentioned in This Passage. He was One of Baudouin's Adversaries, and treated him with the utmost Contempt (96). He

The Effect of the Proportions and Disproportions between the Qualities of one, and the same Man.

He even called him Hermaphrodite; and it seems he took this Word in it's natural Sense; though elsewhere he takes it figuratively (97). "Uxor (inquis), he speaks to Pappyrus Maffio, mihi nulla est, nec unquam fuit. Nec mirum, Maffione: liquidem Balduini præceptoris tui similis es, quem omnes dicebant esse Hermaphroditum (98). --- You say you have no Wife, nor ever had. This is not to be wondered at in Maffio; for you are like your Preceptor Baudouin, who was said, by All, to be an Hermaphrodite." He pleases himself with saying, that Cujacius slighted Baudouin: "Cum omnes sciant quod prædictus Cujacius non fecerit unquam numerum de Balduino plus quam de suis veteribus ocreis (99). --- When All know, that the afore-said Cujacius made no more account of Baudouin, than of his old Boots." Mr Menage observes, and wonders at it, that Cujacius never mentioned Baudouin (100). We have seen, that he wrote very obliging Letters to him (101).

[N] Many Reflexions might be made on the Oddness of his Fortune. He was a Man of Wit, Learning, Eloquence, and Dexterity: He was a handsome Man; and he understood the Intrigues of the Court: Some of These Qualities, which I have specified, were very eminent in him. Great Princes employed him, several times, in Matters of Consequence, which put him in the way to Preferment; and yet he could never advance himself much, and, I think, did not die very rich. How many Persons, inferior in every thing to This great Civilian, rise very high, attain to great Offices, maintain themselves in them, acquire a good Name, great Riches, and much Authority? They have nothing shining in them; They do not excel in any thing, nor have any eminent Qualities: In vain do we look for That, in Them, which excites Admiration; we shall sooner find it in other Persons; who, nevertheless, continue always in a mean Condition, how often however they have had a favourable Opportunity of raising themselves. Most of Those, who consider This Train of Human Affairs, find something in it, which displeases, and vexes them; and They discharge their Spleen on what They call the Injustice or Blindness of Fortune. They seldom hit the true Reason of it; and consider but little Another Cause, which oftener produces This, than They imagine. They ought to know, that Eminent Qualities will not raise a Man to the Height, which they seem to promise, unless They be seconded by some other Qualities, or not crossed by certain Defects; for, not being seconded, or being crossed, they are an Insufficient Cause, and, consequently, according to the Laws of Mechanism, They must fail of their Effect. Now This is the Case of many of Those, who are Men of Great Parts: They want certain Things, with which These noble Talents would perform Wonders, and without which They can neither advance, nor support, Them. The Qualities of These Persons are not well fortified; there is not That Harmony, and Proportion, between Them, which ought to be: So that, instead of assisting, They ruin one another: It is, therefore, no wonder, if a Man does not raise himself, and even if he miscarries, with such an Equipage. As for Those, who attain to a great Fortune, and maintain themselves in it, without having any Eminent Qualities, it is not to be wondered at. There is such a Concert, or such a Proportion, between Their good and bad Qualities, that they reciprocally support each other, and form thereby a complete Principle, which is sufficient for the Production of a Thousand profitable Adventures. It is with This, as with Machines; for, how coarsely soever they be made, They will play better, if their Parts are ranged, and proportioned, as They ought to be, than the most admirable Machine would do, if some Pieces were taken from it, or if some were added to it, which did not correspond with the rest. It is not enough to join, to a Knowledge of the World, That of Books, much Wit, and Eloquence, and several other Eminent Qualities; if, otherwise, you are unpolite, capricious, indiscreet, lazy, timorous, selfish, subject to mean Jealousies, presumptuous, incapable of following a tedious Business, inconstant, fitter to begin an hundred new Projects, than to support the Fatigue of carrying on the same Business for some time; I say, if you are a Man of such a Stamp, and if, notwithstanding your great Qualities, you do not raise yourself, do not blame Fate, the Iniquity of the Age, or the Malignity of your Neighbours; but blame yourself for it: impute the Cause of it to the Disproportion between the Qualities, which have been allotted you." I reckon Francis Baudouin among Those, who are in this Case. Note, that some Persons, among Those of this Stamp, do themselves Justice: They know the Mixture, which renders all their fine Talents useless; and, if they murmur, it is not against their Neighbours, but against their own Temper, and against Nature, which counter-balances whatever Qualification she had given them for rising in the World. However, I do not intend to comprehend, in This Hypothesis, a great Number of Particular Cases, in which the Causes of a Bad, or Good, Fortune are altogether External; I mean, that They, who, notwithstanding their eminent Qualities, remain in Obscurity, have had no favourable Opportunity of raising their Condition, and that They, who have attained to great Preferments, without any Merit, have found themselves in such an active Whirl of Circumstances, that They have had no Occasion to second it, and that their Incapacity was no obstacle in their Way. But remember, that Baudouin did not want Opportunities: They were often thrown in his Way.

BAUTRU DES-MATRAS (MAURICE), chief Lieutenant of the Provostship of Angers. His Sons, and Grandsons, have made his Name very famous, as shall be shewed.

BAUTRU DES-MATRAS (JOHN), Son of the foregoing, was an Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, and One of the best of them; for Anthony Loisel, in his Dialogue about Advocates, speaks of him in this manner; Bautru had a bigger Flight, than They all; I do not say, that he was more Learned, than any of Them, but his Tongue was better hung, and, if I may say so, more Angevin (a). William and René BAUTRU DES-MATRAS were his Brothers. William, Counsellor in the Great Council, and Great Reporter of France (b), was Father of the famous Mr Bautru, of the French Academy, of whom we shall speak hereafter. René, Assessor in the Presidial Court of Angers [A], and Mayor of Angers in 1604, was Father of Charles, Canon of Angers, known by the Name of PRIOR DES-MATRAS, and Author of some Treatises of Divinity (c) [B]. I think it is the same Prior des-Matras, who was so famous for his witty Sayings [C], that he came but little short, in them, of Mr Bautru of the French Academy.

[B] Author of some Treatises.] Here is what Mr Menard says of him, in his List of the Writers of Angers. "Carolus Bautru, Presbyter, Doctor Theologus, & Professor, Ecclesiæ Mauriciæ Angedavenfis Canonicus, maximi ingenii scientiarumque dotibus excellens, familiæque inter clarissimas præcipua. Scripsit de sanctissimo Eucharistiæ Sacramento tractationem, brevi publicandam, quam vidimus. Interea typis exposuit disputationem ad articulum quartum quæstionis 76. tertie partis Summæ Theologicæ Sancti Thomæ, utrum tota quantitas dimensio corporis Christi sit in hoc Sacramento, Andegavi, apud Antonium Hernault, 1638 (1). — Charles Bautru, Priest, Doctor and Professor of Divinity, Canon of Angers, a Man of great Wit and Learning, and of a very noble Family. He wrote a Treatise concerning the Sacrament of the Eucharist, shortly to be published, which I have seen. "In the mean time he put to the Press a Disputation on the Fourth Article of the Seventy sixth Question of the Third Part of St Thomas's Summary of Divinity, Whether the whole dimensive Quantity of the Body of Christ be in the Sacrament. Angers, for Antony Hernault, 1638."

[C] He was famous for his witty Sayings.] Mr Cousin observes (2), that Mr Menage's Memory supplied him with many witty Sayings, which he had learned in his Youth, and that the best of them were those of the Prior Bautru des Matras. This shews, that, in Mr Cousin's Judgment, the Prior is to be preferred before the other Bautru, as to witty Sayings: for he could not be ignorant, that Mr Menage had as well learned Those of Bautru the Layman, as those of Bautru the Ecclesiastic. The Menagiana shews us, that Mr Menage had improved much more in the School of the first, than in That of the other.

BAUTRU (WILLIAM) Count de Serrant, Counsellor of State in Ordinary, Introdutor of Embassadors, Ambassador to the Archduchess in Flanders, and the King's Envoy in Spain, England, and Savoy, was of Angers (a), and Son of William Bautru, Counsellor in the Great Council (b). He was one of the finest Wits of the XVIIth Century. He was, above all things, admired for his Jest, and smart Repartees [A]; and we find, in the Writers of his Time, a thousand Marks of his great Reputation. One of them (c) says; He is a Man, who makes part of his Philosophy to consist in admiring but very few things, and who, for these fifty Years, has been the Delight of all the Ministers and Favourites, and generally of all the great Men in the Kingdom, and was never their Flatterer. He was admitted into the French Academy at the beginning of its Foundation; he could not well be forgotten, being so well known to the Cardinal de Richelieu. His Marriage with Mariba Bigot, Daughter of a Master of the Accompts of Paris, did not prove a very happy one. (A fine Subject for Common-Place and Reflexions!) [B] A Son proceeded from "[A] He was particularly admired for his Jest, and smart Repartees." I desire no other Proof of it, than the Turn of the Poet St Amant, in laughing at Those, who loved silly Jest, and Quibbles:

Si vous oiez une équivoque,
Vous jettez d'aise votre toque,
Et prenez son sens malautr
Pour un des beaux mots de Bautru (1).

When Pun ambiguous you bear,
With transport you applaud the Joke:
"Tis wondrous fine, I vow and swear;
A better Bautru never spoke.

The Menagiana would supply me with strong Proofs, if I stood in need of them: Mr Bautru is to be found in every Page of it; and we are told, in the Preface, "That, besides the witty Sayings of Mr Menage, there are Others to be found there, and particularly Those of the Famous Mr de Bautru, whom he knew perfectly well; for he had been his great Friend, and had seen and conversed with him very familiarly." Collier's Letter, which I have quoted

[B] His Marriage — did not prove a very happy one. A fine Subject for Common-places!] Since, what I am going to say, was printed at Paris, with Privilege, I may, doubtless, publish it in Holland, without fear of incurring the Censure of Judicious Persons. "Mr de Serrant (5) was the Son of Mr de Bautru; and, though they lived together, where Mr de Seignelay lives at present, yet neither of them owned themselves as Father, or Son. Mr de Bautru said, that he would own Mr de Serrant for his Son, provided he was a good Man; perhaps he had some reason to question whether he was so or not. The violent Suspicions, which he had, of his Wife's Disloyalty had induced him to prosecute her at Law, and to be revenged of her. And, indeed, he caused his Servant to be seized, whom he accused of having had intelligence with his Wife, and procured him to be condemned to be hanged, at his first Trial: The Servant appealed, and was only condemned to the Gallies, because he made it appear, that Mr Bautru had done himself justice, and had used him cruelly. This Affair having made a great noise, Mr de Bautru resolved to laugh at it, as well as others, and would say sometimes: If the Bautru's are Cuckolds, they are not Fools. His Wife would always be called Madam de Ngent, notwithstanding her Marriage (6), saying, that she would not be called Madam Bautrou by Queen Mary de Medicis, "who could, then, hardly pronounce French right." This is what I find in the second Edition of the Menagiana; in which they have adjusted This Passage, which was not intelligible in the First Edition. But, since this Lady's Name has been written after the Italian Pronunciation, it is easy to see why she refused to bear it. Quibbling prevailed at that time, and she was exposed to Raillery by various Allusions to the Word trou (Hole).

If Wit could secure a Man from Cuckoldom, which so many People dread, and so many call a Trifle, Mr de Bautru would have been exempted from This Disgrace; but Wit, Courage, a noble Mien, and even the Royal Dignity, are no security against it. This Disgrace has something common with Death; but there is this difference: Death spares no Crowned Heads; and there are every where very virtuous Queens. Notwithstanding this difference, the same Common-place of consolation ought to make an infinite Number of People submit to both these Accidents with Patience. A Poet, who was a Philosopher endeavours, very nobly, to inspire an indifference for Death, by this Reason: "Good Kings, The most formidable Monarchs, the

(6) I do not understand This; for, to make it Sense, The Lady, must, I think, have been called Mademoiselle, or Madam de Ngent, when she married Mr de Bautru. Now this is not at all likely; for Mr de Bautru had a Brother, who was called Mr de Ngent, which seems, that That Lordship did not come into their Family by Mr de Bautru's Marriage.

from it, (viz.) William BAUTRU, Count of Serrant, Chancellor to the Duke of Orleans, and Husband of Mary Bertrand, Daughter of Macé Bertrand, Lord de la Basinière, and Treasurer of the Exchequer. From this Marriage proceeded two Daughters, Margaret and Mary Magdalen. The first was married to the Marquis de Vaubrun, her Uncle, a là mode de Bretagne, as shall be said hereafter (d): The second was married to Edward Francis Colbert, Count de Maulevrier, Lieutenant-General of the Armies of France, and Brother to Mr Colbert. The Menagiana informs me, that the Grandfather of these two Ladies died, being about Seventy Years of Age

"Greatest Warriors, the finest Genius's, the Inventors of Arts, and the most Subtle Philosophers, are dead; and shall you, an inconsiderable private Man, and a Slave to a thousand shameful Passions, complain, that Death will not spare you?"

CREECH.

Let us say the same to Those inconsiderable private Persons, who are vexed at the Intrigues of their Wives: "You torment yourselves for a Thing, from which the most powerful Monarchs, the greatest Warriors, the finest Wits, and the most learned and zealous Doctors, are not exempted. What are You, that you should be more nice, than they? Learn, by these great Examples, to bear your Misfortune patiently."

Give me leave to say, by the by, that our Malherbe made use of Lucretius's Thought, in the Epitaph of a Prince.

Je suis poudre toutes fois,
Tant la Parque a fait ses loix

Egales & nécessaires,
Rien ne m'en a su parer:
Apprenez, ames vulgaires,
A mourir sans murmurer.

In common Dust, a Monarch once, I lie;
Such is th' impartial Law of Destiny.
Ye Vulgar Souls, when Fate's Decrees require,
Learn hence, without a murmur, to expire.

On occasion of this Passage of Malherbe, Mr Menage mentions the Epitaph of Margaret of Austria, which ends thus:

At vos plebeio geniti de sanguine, quando
Ferreæ nec nobis didicerunt fata, nec ullis
Parcere nominibus, patientius ite sub umbras.

You, who of base Plebeian Clay are made,
Since Death, impartial, strikes the greatest Head,
Resign, contented, to the fatal Blow,
And go, with patience, to the Shades below.

Johannes Secundus is the Author of This Epitaph: Mr Menage made a Parody of Malherbe's Verses on occasion of an Epic Poem (8).

I shall also observe, by the way, that the like Morality has been made use of, to teach all Men, that they ought not to complain of being subject to Death. It has been represented to them, that the greatest Cities are destroyed; and are They so unreasonable, as to think it strange, that Man should dye! "Ex Asia rediens, cum ab Ægina Megaram versus navigarem, cœpi regiones circumcirca prospicere. Post me erat Ægina, ante Megara, dextra Piræus, sinistra Corinthus: quæ oppida quodam tempore florētissima fuerunt, nunc prostrata & diruta ante oculos jacent. Cœpi egomet mecum sic cogitare: 'Hem, nos homunculi indignamur, si quis nostrum interit, aut occisus est, quorum vita brevior esse debet, cum uno loco tot oppidum cadavera proijcta jaceant (9). — Returning out of Asia, as I sailed from Ægina towards Megara, I began to survey the Countries around me. Behind me was Ægina, before me Megara, on my Right Piræus, on my left Corinth: which Cities, formerly the most flourishing, now lie in Ruins. I began to reflect with myself: What! Shall so inconsiderable a Creature as Man, whose Life ought to be still shorter, complain of being Mortal, when, at one view, we behold the Ruins of so many Cities?' Tasso has copied this Thought very well.

What wonder, if the Human Frame decay?
Death sweeps the Monuments of Art away.

Scarron, who turned every thing into Burlesque, made, as every one knows, a fine Sonnet upon this Thought. It begins thus:

Superbes monumens de l'orgueil des humains,
Pyramides, tombeaux, dont la vaine structure,

The last six Verses run thus:

Par l'injure des ans vous êtes abolis,
Ou du moins la plupart vont être démolis.
Il n'est point de ciment que le tems ne dissoute:
Si vos marbres si durs ont senti son pouvoir,
Dois-je trouver mauvais qu'un méchant pourpoint noir,
Qui m'a dure deux ans, soit percé par le coude?

Ye Tombs, and Pyramids, that brave the Sky,
Proud Monuments of Human Vanity!
By Time destroy'd, in Ruins now Ye lie.
No Cement can resist it's mighty Power:
If Time the strongest Marbles can devour;
Should I complain, that a vile Doublet black Betrays, in Two Years' Wear, full many a Crack?

Let us not forget Authors of a low Rank: They, and first of all myself, ought to make some use of This Morality: The Faults, which escape us, are pardonable, because the most famous and learned Writers, as the Scaliger's, the Salmafus's, have committed many over-sights. If such Authors are often mistaken, Those of a mean Rank, in the Commonwealth of Learning, ought not to be ashamed of their Mistakes, any more than other Nations were ashamed of being overcome, after the downfall of Carthage; Poë Carthaginem vincit neminem puduit (13): This is what I have said, in the Plan of this Dictionary (14). Observe, that it must not be pretended, that I contradict, here, what I said there, and which I had enlarged on another place (15), that great Authors are most subject to commit Faults. This is very True in certain Respects; and, yet, their Mistakes may serve for a Comfort, and Excuse, to Vulgar Writers. But an ill use ought not to be made of them: we must endeavour to aim at Perfection.

[C] He died, properly speaking, without Confession.] The Menagiana affords me the Proof of this: "Mr de Bautru was about Seventy seven Years of Age, when he died. He came often to see me, two or three Years before his Death, on the Days that I held a Conference at my House. I was at one of my Friends, when word was brought me, that he was fallen into an Apoplectic Fit. I ran to see him; but he had already lost his Senses. Father de Harrouys was sent for to confess him. When they told him what he was come for, he said to him, with a troubled Voice, Father, I do not know you, neither do you know me, and yet I must tell you the most secret Things that I have done. I saw him die — He died, as it were, without speaking, and even without Confession. He confessed himself, indeed; if Confession may be made by an Interpreter. As he was stammering, a Footman explained to the Confessor for what his Master would say. I leave you to think, what a Confession This was (16)." If the Question should be asked, Why his ordinary Confessor was not sent for? it may, perhaps be answered, Because he had none. It is probable, that he was one of Those, who put off the Sacrament of Penitence to their last Hours.

[D] He was no Bigot.] This may be inferred from what I have just now said, that there was no Acquaintance between him, and the Confessor, who prepared him for Death. But can any thing be more express than the Testimony of his Son? "After the Death of Mr de Bautru, when they were about telling his House, they found his Chapel out of order and in decay. It is no wonder, said Mr de S — (17), for Mr de Bautru neglected his Chapel, as much as he took care of his Kitchen and Library." If he preserved an outward Appearance, it was only for the Sake of Decency: Being retired to St Lazarus's, some One gave him That Part of the Passion to meditate upon, which he thought would affect him most; and he fixt his Thoughts on the three Dices that is to say, on the Place, where it is said, that the Soldiers cast Lots for our Saviour's Garment. He loved Gaming much (20).

[E] He was very much afflicted at his Wife's Disloyalty.] See, in the Remark [B], how he sued his Wife, and the severe Punishment, which he caused to be inflicted on his Servant, her Accomplice. Is not This to be very sensible of the Disgrace of the Forehead? But, on the other side, he soon laughed at it, as others did, and would say sometimes, If the Bautru's are Cuckolds, they are no Fools (21). It was the most cunning expedient he could chuse (22) for, if such a Jester, as he was, had appeared serious, fullen and melancholy, he would have been very much laughed at. And, when all is done, he might jest upon it at his Ease, since he had not connived at the Fault; it is only a voluntary Cuckoldom, which may justly be reproached, either seriously, or in jest. It is somewhat surprizing, says Mr Menage (23), that, for forty or fifty Years, Mr de Bautru should have filled all Europe with his jests, and witty Sayings, whilst there were so many things to say against him. Risum fecit, sed ridiculus fuit. I do not know where I have read this: Assurance goes a great Way (24).

[A] He was known by the Name of Count de Nogent. This Count was one of Sorbiere's Patrons, as appears by the twentieth Letter of That Author, wherein he intreats him to improve, to his Advantage, the Elogy, which he had made on Cardinal Mazarin. This appears yet better by the Eighty first Letter, where he thanks him for the Money, which his Eminence had granted him with. I quote these Letters, that They, who desire to know Men by public Testimonies, may satisfy their Curiosity. They may also see the Forty seventh Letter. The Menagiana contains some curious Things concerning the Count de Nogent. "He came to Paris with but "Eight hundred Livres yearly Rent; and he had "an Hundred and fourscore thousand, when he died,

"The first Day he appeared at Court, he carried the King on his Shoulders through a watery Place in the Tuilleries. Monsieur de Nogent was an admirable Man at reviving a languishing Conversation. His Body was found, fifteen Days after, in the Rhine, three Leagues below Tolhuis, where the French crossed That River. This Count had married Diana Charlotte de Caumont de Lausun, Sister to the Marquis de Lausun, who has been Captain of the Life-Guards, and Governour of Berri, and had the Honour to be betrothed with Mademoiselle de Mompensier, Daughter of Gaston of France, Duke of Orleans, and Grand-daughter of Henry the Great. which he had, of reviving a languishing Conversation, are a great Help in the World; for, since, in the very Circles of the Queens of France, they are apt to fall into a kind of Drowsiness, which is almost as troublesome to the Company, as a Calm to Seamen; one may very well think, that a great many other Assemblies are subject to This Inconvenience. Is it not, therefore, very agreeable, that somebody should be always ready to revive the Company, that it may not be said, as Those Ladies in the Menagiana did, It rains Weariness, as fast as it can pour? But I wonder how the Count de Nogent, endowed with This Virtue, could be so weak, as Mr Menage represents him to be, against the Attacks of Angeli. "One Day, at the King's Dinner, Angeli said to the Count de Nogent, Let us be covered; This is of no Consequence to us. The Count de Nogent was so vexed at it, that it did not a little contribute to his Death (2)." In the first Edition This was said of Mr de Bautru, the Count de Nogent's eldest Brother. It is true, that, instead of saying, that it contributed much to his Death, it is only said, that he was very much troubled at it. It were to be wished, that Mr Menage had corrected the Menagiana himself.

[B] Armand Bautru - - - - was killed in 1672, as he was passing the Rhine.] The News Writers of those Times informed the Public (3), That They, who believed the Count was drowned, without having been wounded, and that his Horse was the Cause of his Death, were mistaken; since, after his Body was found, it was discovered, that he was killed by a Musket-shot in the Head. They published also, that his Body was buried in the great Church of Zevenart. In the Year 1686, the Marquis de Biron married a Daughter of This Count de Nogent.

[C] Nicolas Bautru, Marquis de Vaubrun.] It is He, of all the Family, who seems to have been most familiar with Sorbiere: That Author's printed Letters witness it; as also his Relation of a Journey to England. From the Letter, which he wrote to him, the eighth of August, 1657 (4), we learn, that This Marquis was Colonel General of the Carabiniers of France, and of an extraordinary Valour, but that it did not hinder him from being fond of good Books; "I wait, says he to him, for the Happiness of seeing you again at Paris, the next Winter, in That Chamber of the Louvre, where I have found you so often reading Tacitus, whilst the other Courtiers were employing the Morning in powdering their Hair, and tying their Knots of Ribbons." He was a very active Officer: His Disputes with the Count de Lorge, after the Death of Marshal de Turenne, had like to have proved very fatal to the French.

BEAUCAIRE DE PEGUILON (FRANCIS), in Latin Belcarius Peguilio, Bishop of Metz, was a very learned Man in the XVIth Century [A]. He descended from one of the most ancient Families of the Bourbonnois, and was one of the first Gentlemen of his Country, who applied themselves solidly to the Study of Literature. The Progress, which he made in it, induced Claudius of Lorrain, first Duke of Guise, to choose him for Preceptor to his second Son, the Cardinal of Lorrain. Beaucaire succeeded so well in this Employ, that he received many Praises for it from the Court of France, which he did not expect. He went with the Cardinal of Lorrain to Rome, where he conferred with Paul Jovius, Bishop of Nocera, which did not hinder him afterwards from confuting That Prelate's Historical Mistakes. At his return from Italy, the Cardinal of Lorrain procured him the Bishopric of Metz [B]: He carried him afterwards to the Council of Trent; and it was before That

[A] He lived in the XVIth Century.] According to Konig, he was alive in the Year 1625. Res Gallicae, says he, anno 1625, in literas redegit. - - - - In the Year 1625, he wrote an History of the French Affairs. Which is false. It is true, his History was printed at Lyons, in the Year 1625; but it had been written a long time before. The Bibliographers often commit such Mistakes.

[B] The Cardinal of Lorrain procured him the Bishopric of Metz.] Some say, that he only kept This Bishopric for the Cardinal. The Reader will not be displeased to find, here, the Account, which Theodorus Beza gives of the whole Matter. "At that same time (1), says he (2), Charles of Lorraine, Cardinal, and Bishop of Metz, the greatest "Enemy, that our Religion had, resigned the Bishopric of Metz; at which Those of the Reformed Religion greatly rejoiced. But, as it was not at all likely, that such a Man, being the most Ambitious and Covetous of any of his Rank in the World, should voluntarily resign such a noble Preferment, it was immediately discovered, that this Hypocrite had only resigned his Title of Bishop, as making a Conscience of holding so many Crosses in his Hands, and reserved, in the mean time, all the Temporalities to himself. This Titular Bishop's Name was Peguillon, one of his Protonotaries, a Man of some Learning, but little skilled in Divinity, who, being accompanied by two other Bishops, viz. of Toul and Verdun, both like

That famous Assembly, that Beaucaire delivered the Speech [C], which is at the end of his thirtieth Book (a); for you must know, that he wrote an History of his own Times in Latin, which is much esteemed. He began it, when, in the Year 1568, he had resigned the Bishopric of Metz to Cardinal Lewis of Lorraine [D], and was retired to his Country-Seat, called la Chrete, in Bourbonnois. He brought it down from the Year 1462, to the Year 1567, and left off writing it, in the Year 1588. He was, then, in his Seventy fifth Year (b); for he was born the Fifteenth of April 1514 (c). He designed to continue it (d); but it is probable, the Infirmities of Old-age prevented him. He did not intend to publish This Work [E]; for he feared he had spoken such Truths, as might raise him dangerous Enemies. It was Philip Dinet, Sieur de St Romain (e), who, having found This History in the Author's Library at la Chrete, caused it to be printed, at Lyons, in the Year 1625 (f). It is said, that Beaucaire died the Fourteenth of February 1591 (g). He was a very fit Person to draw up the Decisions of a Council [F]; for he knew how to manage the Terms so well, that all the Disputants, that were to be satisfied, were pleased with it. like himself, came to Metz, and alarmed a little those of the Reformed Religion, who thought they were come as Inquisitors, with some great Power, to persecute them, which made many of them absent from the City. But God diverted this Storm; and Peguyon was contented to publish a little Book in Latin, concerning Sanctification, and the Baptism of Infants, which was soon after answered: So that Those, who had abated themselves, returned without any Molestation. But These Shops gained a Nick-name by it, which was given them by those of their own Religion, who first named them the Lent Bishops, because, said they, they are as meagre as Lent, having only a small Pension, assigned them on the Bishoprics, of which they enjoyed the Titles, but the Cardinal the Profits. See the Remark [D].

[C] He delivered a Speech before the Council of Trent. He spoke it on the Day, which the Fathers of the Council had chosen to give Thanks to God for the Battle of Dreux (3). The two Historians of That Council acknowledge This Prelate's Eloquence (4); but Pallavicini, who does not give such a long Extract of the Speech, is more prolix on the Praises of the Orator, than Father Paul, and remarks also, that Beaucaire had lost his Nephew in That Battle. "Belcarus Episcopus Metensis vir eloquentia præclarus victorum laudes celebravit magnifica oratione ad Synodum, publicæ felicitati gratulatus in luctu domestico, quippe qui Gilbertum Belcarium sui fratris filium amiserat in conflictu, atque hæc omnia eleganti quam scripsit historiæ confignata posteritati tradidit (5). --- Beaucaire, Bishop of Metz, a Man of great Eloquence, celebrated the Praises of the Victors, in a pompous Oration before the Council, congratulating the Public Felicity amidst Domestic Affliction; for he had lost his Nephew, Gilbert Beaucaire, in the Battle; All which he delivered down to Posterity in an Elegant History, which he wrote." [D] In the Year 1568, he resigned the Bishopric of Metz to Cardinal Lewis of Lorraine. When Cardinal Charles of Lorraine made This Bishopric over to him, he reserved the Right of Reversion to himself; Regressum, ut Romani Pragmatici vocant, sibi exceperat (6). But he did not make use of this Right for himself. The Bishopric of Metz remained in Beaucaire's Hands from the Year 1555, till 1568 (7). It is falsely said, in the Advertisement to the Reader, before his History, that he went to Trent, with Cardinal Lewis of Lorraine, to whom he resigned his Mitre. It is certain, that he resigned it to him (8); but he followed Cardinal Charles of Lorraine to Trent. He was at Rome, in the Month of November, 1555, when the Pope gave him his Bull for the Bishopric of Metz. This I infer from his saying, that he admired the Eloquence, with which That Pope represented the Episcopal Duties to him. "Menſe Novembri Paulus me Pontificatu Metensi cedente Lotharingo Cardinale donavit, ac quum illi gratias agerem, me mei officii admonendo, & commissum populum commendando, sacunda in primis & satis proluxa oratione respondit, ut tam expeditam in homine sene & in multis negotiis versato eloquentiam admirarer (9)." After he had resigned, he retired Home, and, to employ his leisure Hours, wrote a Commentary on the French Affairs. "Quum post decimum tertium ex quo id munus suscepissem annum, Metensi pontificatu defunctus esset, eoque cessissem, & me ab hominum frequentia subducens in Christianum fundum (10) paratum fenestru jam dudum inter nostros Boios studiorum meorum domicilium fecissem, me omnino otiosum vitæ extremum tempus traducere viderer, commentarios rerum Gallicarum scripsi (11)."

[E] He did not intend to publish This Work. He declares so himself. "Hos (Commentarios) me editurum non profiteor; lateant in Christiana nostra bibliotheca, donec tuto exire possint: vere nec in cujusquam gratiam aut odium scripsisse confirmo (12). --- I have no Intention to publish them: let them rest in my Library of la Chrete, till they may safely come abroad; I declare, that I wrote them impartially, and with a strict regard to Truth." This he says in his Preface; and here is what he says in the Conclusion of his Work: "Maturo judicio ne in multorum odia incurreremus, veritas enim odium parit, ut inquit poeta Comicus, non statim edendos judicavimus. --- Upon mature Consideration, to avoid giving Offence to many, since, as the Poet says, Truth gains us Enemies, I thought proper to defer the Publication of of Them." He is very violent against the Protestants; but it is not in that Respect, that the Fear of offending several Persons made him resolve not to publish it.

[F] He was a very fit Person to draw up the Decisions of a Council. Father Paul mentions the Difficulty, which the Fathers of the Council found themselves in, on the Question about Marriage. "The first Chapter concerning Abuses, importing the Re-establishment of the Banns, ordered by Innocent III. --- was touched and retouched several times, --- but always so unsuccessfully, that the last Correction was the worst. Among other things, a Point, already agreed upon, was altered; which was, That all Marriages, made in the Presence of three Witnesses, should be valid. And, instead of one of the Witnesses, it was said, That all Marriages, contracted without the Presence of the Priest, should be void; which raised the Ecclesiastic Order infinitely. --- I have not found in my Memoirs, who was the Author of This great Advantage, nor many other Particulars, which I would not have failed to mention, if I had known them. In the mean while, I must not rob Francis de Beaucaire, Bishop of Metz, of the Honour, which is due to him: for it was He, who, seeing the Impossibility of reconciling such different Opinions, gave This Decree the Form it now bears, which really admits of several Senses, but suits admirably well with the various Opinions about That Matter (14)."

We find the following Words in the Annals of Spondanus: "In quo decreto ad formam reducendo quæ probaretur et in sessione promulgaretur, cum patres valde perplexi essent, Franciscus Belcarus Episcopus Metensis, vir pius doctusque & acumine ac maturitate ingenii præstans, eum composuit quæ publicè conspicitur, cæteris comprobantibus (15). --- In the giving of which Decree the Form, which should be approved of, and promulged in the Session, when the Fathers were under great Perplexity, Francis Beaucaire, Bishop of Metz, a pious, learned, and ingenious Prelate, drew up That, which is publicly seen, with the Approbation of the rest." If any one should say, that a Person, who could pleased the Flatterers of the Court of Rome; infomuch, that the Cardinal of Lorrain censured him for it [G], and denied, that he had ever been his Disciple. I refer the Reader to Moreri for some other things which I omit. I believe there is an Exaggeration in That great Number of Books, which he ascribes to Beaucaire, and some Confusion in the Titles, which he sets down [H]. Cardinal Pallavicini praised Lewis XIII for permitting a Book to be dedicated to him, in which the Alliances of Francis I with the Turks are very freely censured (b). That Book is the History of France, composed by our Bishop of Metz. He had a Brother, whose Name was JOHN, who was educated with the Constable of Bourbon (i), and who had a Son killed in the Battle of Dreux, and a Daughter married to Sebastian of Luxembourg, Viscount de Martignies [I].

could draw up a Decree so perspicuously, that every Reader might know, that such and such things are condemned in it, and that only such a thing is formally approved in it, would be a fitter Man to draw up the Decisions of a Council than Beaucaire; This is my Answer. I agree, that such a Man would be more proper for this Business, if Synodical Assemblies could, or would, sacrifice Political Interests to Truth, and Integrity: But, because They, who compose These Assemblies, have not Virtue enough to act only in favour of Justice, or Faith enough to hope, that a good Cause will be sufficiently protected by God, without the Assistance of Politics, there are no fitter Persons for their Purpose, than those, who know how to draw up Acts full of Ambiguities, and such as may satisfy the opposite Parties. However, it cannot be denied, that the Bishop, of whom I speak, was a fit Tool for the Pope; since That Council designed to displease none of the School Factions. "Who will not admire the Prudence of this Council? We are told very ingenuously (16), that the Members of it resolved to contrive their Decisions in such a manner, and to chuse and adapt their Words so, as not to prejudice, in the least, the different Opinions of the Schools, about which the Catholic Doctors were otherwise very much divided. We are further told, that it concerned the Prudence of the Council not to expose the Church to new Troubles, by the Disputes, which would have been raised among Divines, if their Doctrine had been discussed, and censured; and that it appears, that it is one of the Articles, on which the Pope had particularly insisted; not having intimated his Inclination for any particular Thing, but for the managing of the Schoolmen's Disputes, that he might not thwart any Opinion without Necessity, and in order to re-unite all the Catholic Forces against the Sectaries.

"This was praised so exactly, says our Author, that one may see, by the very Words, of which the Decisions are composed, that the Fathers of the Council have been scrupulously exact, in finding out Terms, which should not prejudice any of Those Opinions. If Father Paul had said This, such a Discourse would have been taken for a Satire on the Court of Rome: But it is Cardinal Pallavicini, who says it; and, consequently, it must be believed to be true (17)."

[G] The Cardinal of Lorrain censured him for it.] Cardinal Pallavicini, having said, that the Bishop of Metz declared, that he believed, that Bishops received their Authority immediately from God, and that they were not merely the Pope's Delegates, and that the Pope's Power is not unlimited, adds, that, in this, he went beyond his Bounds, hac in re plurimum ille cancellus transgressus est (18). "It was suspected, continues he, that the Bishop, and the Cardinal of Lorrain, juggled, and acted in concert; but the Cardinal, in order to remove These Suspensions, declared, that he had never been Beaucaire's Scholar, and censured him before the Embassadors of France, and twelve Bishops." Fama erat, hunc Episcopum Lotharingi magistrum fuisse: & sane intimam cum eo familiaritatem exercebat, atque ejus operâ nobilem illum Sædem acceperat. Unde suspicio fuit, eos concorditer se gessisse, & textum à discipulo obscurè propositum fuisse dilucidatum à magistro interpretationis suæ claritate. Sed Cardinalis, hujusce famæ confusus, Qualiter negavit? se nunquam Beauqueri discipulum fuisse; cum quidem à se agnosci viram maximæ literaturæ, sed minimi consilii. Nec abstinent, quin illum castigaret coram duobus Gallis Oratoribus, & duodecim Episcopis (19). They, who know the Spirit of a Court, which was the Soul of this Cardinal's whole Conduct, will not build much on what he said, when he found, that he was called in question for Beaucaire's Opinions. He was willing to make use of him in founding the Business, in order to see whether any thing could be done to please the Gallican Church, but, afterwards, was as ready to disown him, when he knew that the Court of Rome was offended at it. After all, Beaucaire was, perhaps, a Man of no great Conduct, as we may suppose This Cardinal declared. This is but too common among studious Persons.

[H] There is some Confusion in the Titles, which Moreri sets down.] He says, that Beaucaire composed a Treatise of Children, that die in their Mother's Womb, --- and a Treatise against the Calvinists.] This is to declare plainly, that the first of these two Treatises does not oppose the Tenets of the Calvinists; which is false; for it is designed to oppose the Opinion, which they have, that the Children of the Faithful are sanctified in their Mother's Womb; and, therefore, that, though they die without receiving Baptism, they are, nevertheless, saved. The Passage of Theodorus Beza, which I have alleged before (20), informs us, that this Book of Beaucaire was answered. An anonymous Author replied to This Answer; his Reply was printed at Paris, in the Year 1567, in 8vo (21), with the first Treatise of Beaucaire (22), and some others. Properly speaking, the two Books, mentioned by Moreri, are but one and the same Book. Spandanus remarks, that Beaucaire published his Dissertation against the Tenets of the Calvinists, concerning the Sanctification of Children in their Mothers Womb, in 1567; but what I have said before, shews plainly, that This Book had appeared before That time, and a little after Beaucaire's Infatiment in the Cathedral of Metz. Now he obtained That Bishopric in the Month of November, 1555, as I said in the Remark [D]. So that it must be said, that Beaucaire prepared a second Edition of his Treatise, and that he did not publish it till the Year 1567. He inserted some Letters in it, which were intercepted at Châlons, on Marnes, during the Conference of Passy. These Letters were written by Tassin, and Theodorus Beza. Tassin, Minister of Metz, had consulted the Ministers of the Conference of Passy, on the Question, Whether Children, baptized by a Woman, should be re-baptized. He was answered, That some Persons, of great Judgment, did not believe that it ought to be done, and that, therefore, they had thought fit to refer the Discussion of That Point to the Church of Geneva, and to That of Zurich (23). Moreri says, that the History of France, by Beaucaire, begins with the Year 1460, and ends with the Year 1580. But, had he consulted the Authors, whom he quotes, Spandanus (24) would have informed him, that it begins with the Year 1462, and ends with the Year 1566; that the Author promised, indeed, to continue it, if God gave him Life for it, but that the Effect of this Promise did not appear, though the Work was not published till about forty Years after Beaucaire had finished it. The Catalogue of the Bodleian Library commits the same Fault with Moreri: I do not wonder at it, since the Bookseller's Preface contains This Error.

[I] His Brother JOHN --- had --- a Daughter married to Sebastian of Luxembourg.] Beaucaire speaks of This Marriage, and says, that Queen Mary Stuart, the Wife of Francis II, procured him for her Niece, whom the greatly loved (25). Le Laboureur confirms this. "Sebastian of Luxembourg, says he (26), partly "out of Inclination, and partly in hopes of gaining the Affection and Favour of Queen Mary Stuart, married Frances (27) de Beaucaire, Daughter of "John S. de Peguilion, and Maid of Honour to the said Queen, who loved her entirely for her good Qualities. He had an only Daughter by her, whose "Estate

BEAULIEU (LEWIS LE BLANC Sieur de) Minister, and Professor of Divinity at Sedan, in the XVIIth Century, was a Man very commendable for his Learning and Virtue. A great many Theological Theses were maintained under his Direction, and collected into one Volume, after his Death, and printed in England. The Public was so well pleased with them, that This Edition was soon sold off, and Another published in the same Country, in the Year 1683 (a). If he had not been a Frenchman, a Preface would have been prefixed to the first, or second Edition, giving an Account of the Author's Life; for the French are very apt to let the History, or the Life, of a Kinsman, famous for his great Parts, and learned Works, fall into oblivion. The Impossibility I find of fixing the Time, and Place, of the Birth of Lewis le Blanc, the Time of his Promotion to the Ministry, and to the Professorship of Divinity, and other Historical and Chronological Circumstances, must be imputed to such a Negligence. I can say nothing more, than that he died in the Month of February 1675, and that he was well beloved by the Marshall de Fabert (b), one of the greatest Wits of his Age. Some of his Sermons were printed at Sedan, in the Year 1675. It is not in them, that the brightest Merit of the Author is to be looked for, but in his Theses, wherein he treats, with a wonderful Clearness [A], and great Penetration, the most important Matters of Divinity, and applies himself chiefly to remove the Misunderstandings, which have so greatly multiplied Controversies. He lays down the true state of the Question; he clears up things that are ambiguous, and makes it appear, that many Disputes, which are thought to be real, are only Disputes about Words. It is scarce credible, how much this Method prejudiced a great many ignorant Persons against him [B]. They imagined, that he endeavoured to bring back the Reformed to the Communion of the Church of Rome. They, who knew his Virtue, and Piety, did not suspect any such thing of him; nor they, who were capable of judging right of his Theses: But many People in the remote Provinces knew him no otherwise, than as they had been told, that he shewed, that, in some things, the Divines of both Parties did not so much differ from each other, as was believed. These Gentlemen, being unwilling to lessen the Subjects of Division, which they would rather have increased, or being accustomed to interpret things ill, or rashly believe those, who give a bad Turn to the Actions of their Neighbours, looked upon Mr de Beaulieu as a false Brother, who was promoting the great Design of re-uniting both Churches [C], which the Cardinal de Richelieu was so fond of. This Professor's Penetration obliged him

(a) It is the third. The first is that of Sedan, in 4to. The second is in folio.

(b) He was Governor of Sedan.

[A] He treated the most important Matters with wonderful Clearness. Because Mr Nicolle will be sooner believed, than myself, I shall quote a Passage of his Lawful Prejudices against the Calvinists. "One of their Professors of Sedan, whose Name is Lewis le Blanc, has particularly signalized himself on this Subject, in his Theses of Justification. That Professor, who justly deserves the Praise of having an extraordinary clear Head, and of being a very fit Man to unravel Questions, which are perplexed by the different use of Terms, examines, in his Theses, the chief Differences between the Catholics and Protestants, on this Head, and concludes, on all the Articles, that The Catholics are in the right, and The Protestants only contrary to them in Words (1)."

[B] This Method prejudiced a great many ignorant Persons. They are not only weak Men, who have entertained Suspicions against Mr Beaulieu: See here what an ingenious Minister has published; "I respect Mr le Blanc's Memory; but the concern for Truth obliges me to remark, what no one is ignorant of, namely, that This Divine wrote after a manner, which made his Orthodox much suspected. Thinking to clear up Matters, to remove useless Disputes, or Those, which turn only on Words, and to take away all Equivocations, he has extremely strained the Space, which separates us from the Church of Rome. He has reduced the most important Controversies almost to nothing: And, by This Conduct, as also by his great Mildness, and the strong Inclination, which he always shewed for Peace, he has given many Persons occasion to rank him among the Latitudinarians (2). — The famous Mr le Blanc de Beaulieu, for whose Memory I have otherwise a great Veneration, is not a Divine, whose Pen is to be borrowed, to describe the Opinion of the Reformed, about controverted Matters with the Papists. — He was a little too Neutral in the Quarrel, which we have to decide with Them (3)."

Hec ille (Le Blanc, pag. 796, n. 56.) qui laxus nimium est controversiarum quas tractat arbitrio, quo factum ut minimis partium adversarum conciliationi intentum, à communi via Reformatarum sæpe discesserit (4).

[C] It was believed, he was promoting the great Design of re-uniting both Churches. These false Suspicions increased, when a certain Report was spread abroad, That the Marshall de Turenne, being very fond of re-uniting both Religions, had founded the Professor of Sedan, and received a Letter from him, which was shewed to all the Ministers, in order to surprize them. This Report was not altogether groundless: for Mr Jaquelot says, that, in 1672, the Agent, who was employed in This Affair, came to Vallin, in Champagne — with a Credential Letter, signed Lewis, and a Letter from Monsieur de Turenne, to Mr de Beaulieu, Professor of Divinity at Sedan, and with That Professor's Answer to Mons. de Turenne, — and the Signatures of the Pastors of Picardy and Champagne, whom he had visited; but he adds, that This Answer did no Injury to Mr de Beaulieu's Reputation (5). Note, that he produces (6), an Act of the Synod of the Ile de France, which justifies the Ministers, who had signed. The Piece, in which he mentions these things, is a Letter against Mr Benoit, Minister of Deslys, who did not fail to answer it; and who, among other Remarks, made this, that the Signatures of the most innocent Ministers contained This Restriction: "And I promise to contribute to it, as much as lies in my power, with a safe Conscience (7)."
He adds, that this last Clause, "taken from

to avoid certain Terms, commonly received, which he found somewhat inconvenient. He did it, particularly, as to the Doctrine of the Certainty of Salvation. This gave Mr Arnauld an occasion to quarrel with him [D]. Mr de Beaulieu had no Children; his Widow, who was a very understanding and virtuous Woman, shewed an Heroic Constancy in the last Persecution (c). She could never be forced to make any Abjuration; so that, after many Vexations, which she endured, she died without betraying her Profession in the least. Mr le Blanc, Counsellor in the Pre-fidial of Sedan, Brother to Mr de Beaulieu, endeavoured twice to make his Escape into Holland, after his Abjuration, but was taken in the Way, and brought back again into his Country. The King forgave him the Punishment of the Gallies, to which he had been condemned for designing to leave the Kingdom against the Prohibitions (d).

Mr de Beaulieu has been very often cited, in the Quarrel between two French Ministers, who disputed, among other things, about the Principle of Faith. What I cite out of their Writings, may serve to discover his Opinions, and Character [E], and,

“ from Mr de Beaulieu's Letter, was a Snare laid for “ the Simplicity of good Souls. . . . It is certain, “ that Three sorts of Persons were concerned in This “ Project. I. Ill-minded Persons. II. Plain and “ honest Men. III. Wise and clear-sighted Persons, “ but dazzled, either with the seeming Usefulness of “ the Thing, or with the Name of Mr de Beaulieu, “ a Man of great Merit, but of too Apostolic a Sin- “ cerity, to disengage himself from the Craftiness of “ the Marshall de Fabert, an old Courtier, and who “ did not scruple to deceive People (8).” There is “ a small Mistake here; for the Marshall de Fabert “ had been dead above seven or eight Years, before This “ Project was set on foot. Monf. de Turenne was the “ Promoter of it.

[D] This gave Mr Arnauld an occasion to quarrel with him.] He accused him of having renounced the Opinions of the Calvinists in four Points of the Doctrine of the Certainty of Salvation (9). Mr de Beaulieu published a particular Thesis on This Subject, in Answer to Mr Arnauld. The latter replied after his Adversary's Death (10): A Disciple, and intimate Friend, of the deceased, answered Mr Arnauld's Reply (11). I have compared The Disciple's Answer and Mr Arnauld's Reply together, but could not determine which was right, or which was wrong; They are properly Questions of Fact, about which a thousand Equivocations, and all the Art of Disputation, may be used on both Sides. A Man must have more leisure, than I have, to examine This thoroughly. Nevertheless, I believe, if Mr de Beaulieu had written his Apology himself, his Cause would have been better defended.

[E] What I quote out of their Writings, may serve to discover his Opinions, and Character.] Let us begin with a Passage of Mr Saurin: He had just said, That Mr le Blanc's Name is not so much authorized, as famous, among us (12); and here is what he adds: What Mr Jurieu mentions of Mr le Blanc “ is more “ fit to cry down his Doctrine, than to give it cre- “ dit: For Example, Is it not a fine way of defend- “ ing the Authority of the Scripture, and the Truth “ of the Christian Religion, to say, That it is ne- “ cessary, that That, which is the first Principle of “ Faith, should not be proved by itself, nor by another “ Principle; and yet, that the Principle of Faith “ should not be an evident Thing, because, as in Hu- “ man Sciences, there are certain Principles, which “ are the first, on which all others depend, which “ neither depend on themselves, nor on other Prin- “ ciples, so it is with the Doctrine of Faith. They, “ who know the A, B, C, of the Art of Thinking “ and Reasoning, know also, that a Proposition, “ which is not self-evident, and is not mediately, or “ immediately, demonstrated by another self-evident “ Proposition, cannot be a Principle of Science, or “ of Faith, nor so much as pass for a true Proposi- “ tion, whilst it remains in That Obscurity. — Mr “ Jurieu adds, after Mr le Blanc, That, though the “ Scripture, that is to say, the Divinity of the Scrip- “ ture, be not self-evident, it ought not to be conclu- “ ded, therefore, that it is not the first Principle of “ Faith, and that it ought to borrow it's Authority “ from elsewhere (13). These Words neither agree “ with right Reason, nor the Word of God. The “ Divinity of the Scripture is evident by it's Cha- “ racters — Mr de Beaulieu reasons no better, “ when he answers the Objection, which the Ene- “ mies of Christianity make against the Holy Scrip-

“ tures in this manner. As for those impertinent “ Questions, which are asked us, How do you prove, “ that the Apostles wrote their Books by Divine In- “ spiration? We answer, That they require an unjust “ thing of us; viz. that we should demonstrate a “ thing, which is not to be demonstrated. We, there- “ fore, confess freely, that we cannot demonstrate it, “ that is to say, prove and demonstrate it Mathema- “ tically: But we deny, that it follows from thence, “ that Those Books cannot be the first and certain “ Rule of Faith, because it is the Property of the “ Principles of Faith not to be evident (14).” See, in Mr Saurin's own Book how he confutes These Maxims. We must insert Mr Jurieu's Answer here. “ It “ is a curious Thing, says he (15), to see how Mr “ Saurin uses Mr de Beaulieu, whom he calls, else- “ where, a most Excellent Man. But, here, because “ he is of Mr Jurieu's Opinion, and of That of “ the whole Church, concerning the Evidence of “ the Principle of Faith, he must needs be a Man “ of no very sound Orthodoxy; he favoured Popey, “ and Arminianism; he was a great Latitudinarian; “ he saved as many Persons as he could; he propo- “ sed such Absurdities, that he deserved to be sent “ back to his A, B, C; and it is imprudent to own “ one's self his Disciple. The Truth is, we can hard- “ ly believe our own Eyes. Here we may perceive “ what advantage the Living have over the Dead, “ as the Wife Man tells us: Such a one pulls the “ dead Lion by the Beard, who durst not have come “ within a thousand Paces of him, if he had been “ alive. — They, who knew the late Mr de Beau- “ lieu, know, that he was the most reserved Man “ in the World in speaking his own Opinions; A “ faithful Historian of Those of others, but most re- “ served as to his own; giving his Resolution only “ on notorious things, and such as were owned by “ all Divines. So that, unless he had been out of “ his Wits, it is not to be imagined, that he would “ have explained his Mind about such nice Proposi- “ tions, had he not been persuaded, that he followed “ the common Road. How could a Man, who “ made it his Study to know the Opinions of all “ Divines, and who seldom declared his own, be ig- “ norant of a Matter of Fact, known to Mr Saurin, “ who never saw but the Outside of great Libraries? “ Or, was Mr de Beaulieu so foolish, and so wicked, “ as to establish an Impiety, of which he was the “ Author, as a public Opinion? Whom does Mr “ Saurin hope to persuade of this? They, who have “ read the first Part of this Work, about the Mat- “ ter of Fact, will be ashamed of Mr Saurin's Rash- “ nesses: Since they will see, that our Orthodox Di- “ vines, since Calvin, have spoken as Mr de Beau- “ lieu did; and that, in This, and almost in every “ thing else, he is but an Historian. But does not “ Mr de Beaulieu advance some hard Things, about “ this Question, which are peculiar to him? For Ex- “ ample: That the Proofs, which are alleged for “ the Divinity of the Holy Scriptures, are not of the “ Nature of Those, which are called de Fide, in the “ Schools; that they are not drawn from any Prin- “ ciple, or Rule, of Faith, and that, by themselves, “ they cannot make an Article of Faith. Has any “ Body said so? Yes; It has been said, Calvin has “ said it in stronger Terms: he calls Those, who “ build Faith on the Characters of the Scripture (16), “ foolish and impertinent.” These Proofs are not of “ Those, which are called de Fide (17). — “ The “ other and, consequently, will not be superfluous. Some are persuaded, that there is great Misunderstanding in This Contest [F]. His Doctrine concerning the Efficacy of Baptism was also censured. "other Accusation against Mr de Beaulieu *, of being "a Latitudinarian, of enlarging the Way to Salva"tion, and of saving as many Persons as he could, is "also ridiculous, since it is inconsistent with the "Doctrine, which Mr Saurin lays to his Charge.

"He was rigid as to the Doctrine of Grace, and "believed, that the Holy Ghost produced the Cer"tainty of Faith, without Means, as we have seen.
"— This Accusation — is entirely grounded on "his explaining the State of some Controversies
"otherwise than they are commonly understood.
"But, if he should be deceived, it would only be a "meer Error of Fact; for he never favoured any re"laxed Opinion, nor established the Indifference of "Religions, nor a general Toleration of all Sects,
"as Mr Saurin does." Let us end with Mr Saurin's
"Reply. "I speak of Mr de Beaulieu with all the "Esteem and Respect, which he deserves; and I "put a great Difference between him, and Mr *Ju-
"rieu*; not for the reason, which Mr Jurieu sup"poses, that is, because the one is dead, and the "other living; but because the living does not re"semble the Dead in every thing. Nevertheless, I "observe Mr de Beaulieu's Faults as Those of a great "Man. This I may do. I do not send him back "to his A, B, C, as Mr Jurieu accuses me of do"ing, two or three times. I say only, That Those, "who know the A, B, C, of the Art of Thinking and "Reasoning, know also, &c (18) This is certain,
"and may be said by Those, who are persuaded —
"(19). I do Mr de Beaulieu no wrong in calling "him a Latitudinarian. He was not so in the "odious Sense, which Mr Jurieu puts upon the "Word, in taking a Latitudinarian for a Kind of "Atheist. But he was so, in some Degree. The "manner, in which he explains the State of some of "our Controversies, with the Papists, and other
"Sectaries, about Justification, the Certainty of Sal"vation and other matters, is a Proof of it: And
"our Learned and Sincere Divines do not deny it." Since Mr Jurieu replied nothing, I end the Remark here.

(19) Note, that Mr Saurin has not said, as his Adversary supposes, and on which he grounds his Exclamations, Those, who know their A, B, C, but Those, who know the A, B, C, of the Art of Thinking. The Suppression of the last Words is unfair.

[F] There is great Misunderstanding in This Contest. Consider well the above-mentioned Words of Mr de Beaulieu (20). They inform us, that he believed the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures could not be Mathematically demonstrated. Let us compare That with This Answer of Mr Saurin. "If, by Mathe"matical Demonstration, Mr le Blanc understands "such a Demonstration, against which Flesh and "Blood can make no Objection, I acknowledge,
"that the Divinity of the Scripture cannot be Mathe-
"matically demonstrated: but, notwithstanding, it "may be Morally demonstrated, so as to remove all "doubts, which is manifestly contrary to Mr Ju"rieu's Principles (21)." The comparing of these "two Passages shews, that Mr de Beaulieu, and Mr "Saurin, teach the same Thing in the main. They "both own, that the Divinity of the Scripture cannot "be Mathematically proved: But you will say, does "not Mr Saurin maintain, That it may be proved by "Moral Demonstration? I own it; but I should be "very much mistaken, if he could prove, that Mr le
"Blanc did not teach the same Thing. I am sure,
"That great Divine never denied, that the Proofs of "the Divinity of the Scriptures are as strong as Moral "Demonstration. He had no Interest in denying it;
"for, because a Man owns, that a thing cannot be "proved by Mathematical Demonstration, it does not "follow, that, if he argues well, he must acknowledge,
"that it cannot be Morally demonstrated. Let us far"ther shew the Misunderstanding of This Dispute.
"Mr Saurin fancies, that, according to the Principles "of his Adversary, the Proofs of the Divinity of the "Scripture do not exclude all Manner of Doubt. This "is full of Equivocation. His Adversary does not "pretend, that They, who perceive the weight and "force of Those Proofs, ought still to entertain some doubt; he does not deprive them of full Certainty,

"and entire Persuasion. He pretends only, That they do "not see, that the contrary is impossible; as it appears "to be in Things, which have been Mathematically "demonstrated. It happens daily, that we are fully "convinced of a Thing, and have not the least doubt "about it, though we know, that the contrary is "possible. A Traveller, looking in an Inn, the Mas"ter of which he never knew, eats, without fear,
"what is set before him; He knows very well, that "his Meat may be poisoned, and that there is no Meta"physical, Physical, or Moral Contradiction, in sup"posing, that his Meat has been mixed with Poison,
"by chance, or out of Malice. He is not ignorant, that "such things have been done; nevertheless, he is per"suaded, that he ought not to fear any thing in This Case;
"He eats with a full Persuasion, that he shall not be "poisoned. We have still less doubt, when we eat at "a Friend's House; and, yet, we are convinced, that "it is possible, the Meat may be poisoned. Therefore "a Divine must not be censured for saying, that we "are perfectly convinced of the Truth of the Doctrine,
"which our Pastors declare to us, though the Reasons,
"on which they ground them, do not prove to us,
"that it is impossible the thing should be otherwise.
"Let us remember, that Mr Saurin gives up all Pre-"tension to Geometrical Proofs; He is satisfied with "Moral Demonstration, against which Flesh and Blood
"only can raise any Objections. Now This is exactly "his Adversary's Doctrine; They quarrelled therefore "for they knew not what. Mr Jurieu declares, that "he has not laid any thing, which can imply, that he ex"cludes Conviction of Conscience (22); he maintains,
"that he has laid down, that the Characters of Divinity,
"which appear in the Revelation, "Are able to pro"duce a Kind of Certainty in a Man, who has any "Equity, and is not prejudiced, without the Assis"tance of the Spirit of God. But, first of all,
"there are no Men in the World, who are not "prejudiced. All, who are not yet converted, are "full of the Prejudices of the Flesh. Besides, we "do not require I know not what Certainty; but "a Certainty, which surpasses all Certainty, even "That of Sciences grounded on Demonstration (23). (22) Ibid. ib.
"— Surely, Those Characters are not such as "can produce, in a well-disposed Mind, a Certainty
"of Speculation equal to the Certainty of Geome"trical Sciences (24). — He says, first, That (24) Ibid. ib.
"there are none of Those well-disposed Minds in "the World, before Grace. II. That a Man, of "Equity, and no Prejudices, might obtain a Kind of "Certainty of the Divinity of the Scriptures, even "without Grace. III. That the Certainty, which "we require, is a Certainty, which surpasses That "of Geometrical Demonstration (25). Observe "farther, that Mr Jurieu declares, that he meant,
"that Those internal and external Characters, placed
"and ranged, by the Arts of Logic and Rhetoric, in "the Works of our learned Men, by laying down,
"at first, self-evident Principles, and leading the "Mind from one Conclusion to another, make a "better Proof to Reason, than common Moral De"monstration; But that These same Characters,
"nakedly proposed, and without Art, do not make "up Moral Demonstration, especially to the illite"rate, who must be led by the Hand, and are not "able to understand several Things, which require "Study and Penetration. Most of our simple and "illiterate People never consider attentively That "Demonstration, which is called Moral. But These "same Characters, put together, which do not make "up Moral Demonstration to the Mind, especially "in the common Sort of People, form a Proof of "Sentiment, which is beyond all Exception, and "which is as lively as the Impression of the Sun on "the Eyes (26)." Thus these Gentlemen are at last "of the same Opinion: The one does not pretend to "any Mathematical Demonstration, nor the other neither. The latter is for Moral Demonstration, which the other grants him. The most plausible thing, which can be said in Mr Saurin's Favour, is, that, at first, Mr Jurieu did not well explain his Opinion, and that he seems not to have explained it, but by contradicting himself, according to custom. I believe also, that, when he began to meditate on this Subject, he did not very well know the Nature of Moral Demonstration. He formed too great an Idea of it; and This was, probably, the Reason, why he durst not say, that the Proofs of the Divinity of the Scripture amounted to such an high Degree of Evidence. If he had known the true Nature of This Kind of Demonstration, he would have less exposed himself. Moral Demonstration does not lie, like Geometrical, in an indivisible Point; It has a greater compass, and extends, from a Great Probability, to a very Great Probability. There are it's bounds, and, consequently, there is a great way to go from the Place, where our Proofs begin to be called Moral Demonstration, to the place, where they begin to be called Physical, or Metaphysical, or Geometrical, Demonstration. Perhaps, That, which deceived Mr Jurieu, was his seeing, that the Certainty, and Evidence, with which we know, that there was such a Man as Julius Cæsar, such a Republic as Rome, &c. does not pass for Science, but for Human Faith, for Opinion, and, at most, for the Effect of Moral Demonstration; and, because he did not see, that the Inspiration of the Scripture could be proved by as convincing Reasons, as Those, which prove, that Cicero existed, he feared to say, that there was Moral Demonstration for This Inspiration. If he entertained such a Thought, he did not know the true Nature of Things; for it is not true, that the Foundation of the Certainty and Evidence, with which we know, that there was a Roman Republic, is meer Moral Demonstration, nor that our Persuasion in that Respect is an act of Human Faith, or Opinion: It is Science properly so called; it is the Conclusion of a Syllogism, whereof the Major and Minor are clearly and necessarily true Propositions. There is at least Physical Demonstration in it. The School Philosophers were not ignorant of This. "Ille actus non est fidei, sed scientificus; innititur enim non humano testimonio, sed repugnantia physice, qua video non potuisse tot homines convenire ad mentendum. — Ille assensus oritur a duobus principiis, quæ non patiuntur dissentium. Primum est hoc: impossibile est tot homines tot sæculis convenire ad mentendum. Secundum est: hoc dicunt tot homines tot sæculis (27). — This Act is not of Faith, but scientific; for it depends not on human Testimony, but Physical Contradiction, by which I see, that so many Men could not conspire in a Lye. — This Assent

"arises from two Principles, which demand our Assent: The first is: It is impossible so many Men should, for so many Ages, agree in a Lye. The second is: This is affirmed by so many Men for so many Ages." However it be, Mr Jurieu explained himself better at last.

Let us take notice of Mr Saurin's Remark, That, if, by Mathematical Demonstration, Mr de Blacq understands a Demonstration, against which Flesh and Blood can raise no Objection, he acknowledges, that the Divinity of the Scripture cannot "be mathematically demonstrated." It were to be wished, that we had a general Rule to distinguish the Objections, which proceed only from Flesh and Blood; for each Christian Sect ascribes the Objections, which are made by Others, to That Principle, and so the Ball is tossed back again, and the Disputants are so far from deciding a Controversy, by maintaining, that a Doctrine is only opposed by Difficulties, suggested by Flesh and Blood, that it is an everlasting Dispute, whether a Difficulty, or an Objection, proceeds from such a Principle. I add, that there are some Truths, against which the most prejudiced, and most passionate, Men will not dispute, though it be never so much their Interest to oppose them. Porphyry, a great Enemy of the Christian Religion, and a great Zealot for Paganism, did not deny certain matters of Fact, alleged by the Christians. The Interest of his Cause required, that he should deny them; for it is a very great Advantage, in a Dispute, to reject both the Matters of Fact, and the Consequences of them. Mr Saurin, who is fully persuaded, that the Objections, which the Reformed allege against the Church of Rome, do not proceed from Flesh and Blood, knows very well, that, when the Question is about some Miracle, wrought by Relicks, They deny the Fact, and add, That, though the Miracle should be certain, it would not prove the worshipping of Relicks to be lawful. So that, according to the best Laws of Disputation, carefully observed by the Orthodox, Porphyry might have thought himself obliged not only to deny the Consequences of the Facts, alleged by the Christians, but the very Facts themselves. Flesh and Blood, I mean his Prejudices, and Passions, might lead him to it; for the more things we require our Adversaries to prove, the more we puzzle and tire them. How comes it, then, that That Enemy of JESUS CHRIST did not deny certain Facts alleged by the Apostles? Is it not because they could be supported by much clearer Reasons, than Those, which he alleged for what he denied? I decide nothing: it will suffice to say, that sometimes Flesh and Blood lay down their Arms, and submit to a Light, which does not please them.

BEAUMONT (FRANCIS de) Baron Des-Adrets, was one of the Noblemen of France, whose Courage and Military Actions made the greatest Noise in the Religious Wars, under the Reign of Charles IX. He was of Dauphiné, and had learned the Profession of Arms in Piedmont, which was the best, and most famous, School of War in that Age. It is pretended, that the Desire of revenging himself of the Duke of Guise, who had been against him in a Law-Suit (a), made him declare for Those of the Protestant Religion (b). They add, that Catherine de Medicis wrote a Letter to him to excite him to Revenge, and even that she permitted him to make use of the Huguenots, that he might the better ruin That Duke's Authority in Dauphiné. The Duke of Guise, Governour of That Province, had made la Motte Gondrin his Lieutenant there: he was his Creature, and a Gentleman of great Courage (c). Des-Adrets, judging, that he could not begin his Undertakings more successfully, than by ridding himself of That Gentleman, practised upon some People in Valence, and managed his Intelligence in such a manner, that la Motte Gondrin, overwhelmed by the Sedition, which was raised in That City, was stabbed, there, in cold Blood. So that Valence was the first Town, which the Baron made himself master of, and where his Dignity was increased; for, whereas he was before Colonel of the Legionaries of Lyonnois, Dauphiné, Provence, and Languedoc (d), he was chosen, the next day after the Sedition (e), Administrator of Affairs, till the Prince of Condé's farther Declaration. From That Time, he over-run all the Country, and, understanding, that the Protestant Party had made themselves Masters of Lyons, he went thither, and assumed all the Authority to himself [A], without much inquiring,

[A] He assumed, at Lyons, all the Authority. Notwithstanding the Pains Varillas took to trace all the Steps of Des-Adrets, he was mistaken as to the Government of Lyons. He always built on This Foundation, that, as soon as That City declared for the Reformed, the Prince of Condé sent Mr de Souffise ring, whether it would be acceptable. With Five hundred Men, he defeated the Three thousand, which St Vital brought with him into the Neighbourhood of That City, to ravage the Country; he ransacked le Forez, secured Grenoble, where he compelled the whole Parliament to go and hear a Protestant Sermon; he plundered and burnt the great Charter-House; seized on Pont St Esprit; entered, like Thunder, into the Country of Avignon; and had, doubtless, taken the chief City of it, to treat it as the Pope's Troops had treated the City of Orange, had he not been informed, within a League of Avignon, that the Catholics had made themselves Masters of Grenoble. He marched That way immediately, and spread such a Terror among the Catholic Troops, that Maugiron, who commanded them, fled into Savoie, and durst not return into Dauphiné. Grenoble was soon reduced under our Baron's Power, who treated That City more kindly, than they had reason to expect. He was much more barbarous in other Places [B], which he seized by main Force, and where he exercised great Cruelties by way of Reprisals [C]. The Victory, which he obtained, against the Count de Suz, at Vaureas, made him Master of Orange, and of the County of Venaissin, and made Avignon tremble a second time. He defeated all the Pope's Troops; he entered into Provence; and overthrew all that appeared against him. Nevertheless, there were some Disappointments, or private Jealousies, which made him fail of relieving Cisteron. This Disgrace was followed by some others: The Duke of Nemours, after the ill Success of the Siege of Lyons, won two Battles against the Baron Des-Adrets; but durst not engage with him a third time; and

(1) Varillas: to be Governour there (1): for, when he speaks of the first Discontent of Des-Adrets, he says, it proceeded from the News, that Soubise was entered into Lyons (2). This supposes, that, after having commanded there for some time, he left That Post, and that Des-Adrets succeeded him, but that Soubise was sent thither again to the Exclusion of his Successor. This Historian is mistaken; The first, who commanded in the City of Lyons, after it had declared for the Cause, was the Baron Des-Adrets (3): Soubise was not sent thither, but when he was thought to be a fitter Man for That Post, than the Baron; and he continued in it 'till the Peace. Varillas would have known this Gradation, had he considered well his own Words: "Des-Adrets, says he, --- approach-

"be kept. Nevertheless, the Baron Des-Adrets caused them to be thrown down headlong from the Top of the Castle, notwithstanding the public Faith, which was sworn, saying, That it was to revenge the Cruelty, committed at Orange. Some of Them, who were thrown down out of the Windows, from a very great Height, laying hold of the Bars, the said Baron Des-Adrets, very unhumanly, caused their Fingers to be cut off. One of Those, who were precipitated, falling down from the Top of the Castle, which was situated on a great Rock, chanced to take hold of a Branch of a Tree, which he would not let go: they shot, and threw many Stones, at him, but could not hit him. The Baron, wondering at it, saved his Life; and he escaped, as it were by a Miracle. When I was in Dauphiné, I went to see the Place with the Queen-Mother: He, who was saved, was still living near "That Place." D'Aubigné ascribes the taking of Mornac to Montbrun, Lieutenant of Des-Adrets, and observes, that Montbrun endeavoured, in vain, to moderate the Slaughter: that one of Those, who were thrown down, "continued hanging on some Branches, and that some Soldiers having shot at him, without wounding him, Montbrun saved him, and made him serviceable to him (14)." He says also, that Those of Orange "placed several dead Bodies on Floats, and let them go down the River Rhone to Avignon, with these Words written on their Breasts, "Till-Gatherers of Avignon, stop not these Tormentors; for they have paid Tribute at Mornac." All these Facts are taken from Beza's Ecclesiastical History (15), which shews plainly, that Des-Adrets was not the Author of what was done in Mornac. So that the Supplement to Moreri must be corrected by This, as well as the Memoirs of Castellau, and Maimbourg's History of Calvinism.

[C] He was cruel, by way of Reprisal. Here we must take notice of a great Fallacy of Maimbourg. After having mentioned the Cruelties of Des-Adrets, he adds these Words; "There were indeed some Catholics, who, being justly incensed at so many horrid Crimes, abused the Right of Reprisals, and treated them almost in the same Manner, of their own Authority; but there were but few, who persecuted so (16)." He supposes, then, that Des-Adrets began to exercise These Barbarities, and that the Catholics only followed his Example, and made use of them by way of Reprisals. But this is either gross Ignorance, or prodigious Infirmity; for Historians, least suspected of Partiality towards those of the Protestant Religion, confess ingenuously, that the Cruelties, which were exercised at Orange, preceded Those of Des-Adrets. Do but read Varillas's History of Charles IX (17), and you will find there, that, before the Leaps of Mornac and Montbrun, the Catholics had exercised the most enormous Cruelties at Orange, and particularly That of precipitating People from the Tops of Rocks, or on Pikes and Halberts. See the Article SERBELON (FABRICIUS), where I mention These strange and found it more proper to use Artifices, to induce This formidable Leader of the Protestants to change sides [D]. They endeavoured to prevail upon him by Promises, and Threats [E]; they shewed him, that he had great Enemies in his Party [F]: At last, they staggered him in such a manner, that his Conduct became more and more suspected by the Prince of Condé, and the Admiral. The Conclusion was, that they secured his Person [G], at Romans, the Tenth of January, 1563 (f). He did not come out of Prison, but by the Treaty of Peace, which was concluded the Barbarities. Castelnau, whom I have already quoted, makes use of this memorable Reflexion; "Indeed it seemed, that, by a Judgment of God, the Cruelties were reciprocal on both sides; and Orange was thought to be the Foundation of Those, which were committed by the Huguenots, in cold Blood, in Dauphiné." Let us not forget the Baron's Answer to his Officers, when they represented to him the Injustice he was going to commit, and the Evils, which it might draw on their Party. He replied, with a Face, whose natural Deformity was much increased by Fury, that the Punishment, which he was going to inflict, was necessary to stop the Cruelty of the Catholics, and that, in order to reduce them to the Laws of a fair War, which they had first violated at the taking of Orange, it was necessary they should know, that the Calvinists could wage a cruel War, as well

"as themselves (18)." Varillas, who ridicules These two Excesses, could not confute him as to these Words, which they had first violated at the taking of Orange, since he had already observed, of himself, "that the Baron heard of the Cruelties, committed at Orange, with those inward Transports of Joy, which a bloody Man is capable of, when an unexpected Accident gives him an Opportunity of committing all manner of Excesses, without being reproached for having been the Aggressor (19)." I refer my Reader to the Answers, which Des-Adrets made to d'Aubigné, who asked him, one day, three things: "Why he had committed some Cruelties so ill becoming his great Valour? Why he had forsaken a Party, to which he was so much indebted: and, then, why he had no Success in any thing, since he had forsaken That Party, though he had acted against it (20)?" He answered, to the first Point, "That no body commits a Cruelty in returning one; that the first are called Cruelties, and the second Justice. Having, thereupon, made an horrible Discourtesy, of above Four thousand Murders, committed in cold Blood, and of the Invention of unheard of Torments, and chiefly of the Leaps of Malcon, where the Governour taught the very Children to see the Huguenots die without Pity, he said, that he had served them something like it, having Regard to the Time past, and to the Time to come: with Respect to the Time past, not being able to endure, without great Cowardice, the tearing in pieces his faithful Companions; and as for the Time to come, there were two Reasons, which no Captain can disapprove; the one, that the only Means to put a stop to the Cruelties of an Enemy, is to return them the like (21); whereupon he mentioned Three hundred Horsemen, sent back, some time ago, to the Enemies Army, on Waggon, having each of them a Hand, and a Foot, cut off, to change a merciless War into a courteous one." All his other Answers are full of Sense; to which I refer my Readers as I have said already, contenting myself to observe, here, I. That These Leaps of Malcon are to be found in the Article of That City. II. That our Baron justified himself more faintly to the Duke of Nemours, than to d'Aubigné. See the following Remark.

[D] The Duke de Nemours used Artifice. If we may believe Varillas, the Duke of Nemours prevented Des-Adrets, by writing a Letter to him, desiring him to treat two Italian Soldiers, who were fallen into his Hands, as Prisoners of War (22). But Beza says, the Baron wrote first to the Duke, to desire him to let at Liberty two Italian Soldiers (23). There is no question but that Varillas is mistaken; for Des-Adrets's Letter, set down at length in Beza's History, begins with the Request of the Liberty of Those two Italian Soldiers. Varillas has committed another Fault; for he does not faithfully report the Substance of That Letter: he pretends, that the Baron imputed the Cruel Executions of Vaureas, Boulenne, and Pierrelate, to the Necessity of obliging the Catholics to a fair War with the Calvinists, whom they banded as fast as they took them; and that he added, that, after having obtained this Point, so necessary to his Party, that he could hardly find any Soldiers before, he observed exactly the Military Laws, which had learned in Piedmont. There is nothing like This in Des-Adrets's Letter; he only confesses, that, at Pierrelate and Boulenne, two Towns, which he had taken by Assault, he could not, to his great Grief, withhold the Soldiers from taking their Revenge on Four or Five hundred Men, whom they found there. His Apology does not consist in alledging just and necessary Motives of his Cruelties, nor in saying, that, having attained the end, for which he had committed them, he desisted from them; he only denies them; and he does it, as Beza observes, in a very faint and soft Style. Varillas says truly, that the Duke of Nemours, apprehending y That Letter, that Des-Adrets was discontented, caused a Conference to be proposed to him, which was accepted.

[E] They endeavoured to prevail with him by Promises. [E] They wrote very civilly to him (24), and, after having represented to him, that the way, he took, would infallibly lead him to a Confiscation of Body and Estate, they tempted him with a Promise of the Collar of the Order, and with That of a Company of fifty Men at Arms, with the Sum of an Hundred thousand Livres; and, if he chose to live out of the Kingdom, they engaged themselves to send him the Sum of an Hundred thousand Crowns. The Duke of Nemours used all manner of Promises and Flatteries, when he conferred with Des-Adrets.

[F] They represented to him, that he had great Enemies in his Party. The Marshal de Brissac communicated a Letter of the Admiral to him, which he had received in the following Manner. Soubise, who suspected Des-Adrets, had acquainted the Admiral with it; the Soldier, who carried the Letter, was intrusted with an Answer to it; but, instead of carrying it to Soubise, he brought it to the Marshal de Brissac (25). Here are the Contents of it, as far as they relate to This Baron; "As to what you write to me, concerning the Baron Des-Adrets, every Body knows him to be what he is; but, since he has, hitherto, served so well in This Cause, we must bear his Insolence a little; for it is to be feared, that his Insolence may be changed into Fury. Wherefore my Opinion is, that you use your Endeavours to bring him to a Conference, and bear with him as much as you can."

[G] They secured his Person. [G] Here is a Passage of Castelnau's Memoirs. "The Duke of Nemours, knowing Des-Adrets to be a good Captain, and a Person of great Credit and Reputation, thought it more expedient for the King's Service to gain him over, than to oppose him by Force; which he did so dexterously, with fair Promises, and smooth Words, (as being a very persuasive Prince, and who always knew how to prevail upon Men by his winning Address) that the Huguenots never had, since, a greater Enemy in That Country, than This Baron, who began, from that time, to contrive Mischief against them. The Huguenots, being very vigilant, had notice of it; for they had Spies every where. Which was the Reason, why the Baron Des-Adrets, being gone to Valence, was taken Prisoner by Mowans, (by Advice of Cardinal de Chatillon, and of the Sieur de Carfil, since made Duke of Uzes), who sent him to Nîmes, where he was in very great Danger, and would hardly have escaped with Life, had it not been for the Peace; by Virtue of which he was set at Liberty (26)." See the twelfth Book of Beza's Ecclesiastical History, where the Detention of Des-Adrets is mentioned at large. "After divers Interrogations and Answers — Peace intervening, he was released, and sent to his House, without any Abolition or Condemnation." These are Beza's Words (27).

(24) It was the Marshal de Brissac, who carried the Letter, first. Theod. Beza published his Letter, Hist. Ecclesi. pag. 291.

This General shewed no longer the same Vigilance, Activity, Intrepidity, and Presence of Mind, which had been admired as Prodiges, whilst he served the Cause. All Those great Qualities, and the Victories, which he obtained over the Papists, did not hinder the Protestants from looking upon him as a Goliath, who dishonoured the Battles of Israel, by his barbarous Conduct [I]. He died without Honour, in an ignominious Old-Age, equally despised by both Parties (h); much unlike That Baron Des-Adrets, Quantum mutatus ab illo! who had been dreaded as far as Rome (i); for they were apprehensive there, that

A PASSAGE of D'Aubigné criticised.

What! were not the Papist Soldiers full of Revenge and Passion? Did they not hear continually their Priests, who exhorted them to take Vengeance of the Huguenots, for their plundering and prophaning of Churches? Is there any thing, which inspires more Fury, than such Discourses? What shall we say of the Decrees (34), "which permitted all manner of "Persons, and even ordered all Communities to fall "upon the Huguenots, at the ringing of the Alarm-

"Bell, to pursue them strenuously every where, and "and to kill them without Mercy, as so many wild "Beasts, mad Dogs, and Wolves, that destroyed

"all the Kingdom: So that, through the Crimes of "one Party, and the Revenge of the other, there was "nothing to be seen, in all the Provinces of France, but

"Burnings, Blood, and Slaughter, and a Thousand fright- "ful Images of Death?" Could the Catholic Soldiers be free from Passion and Revenge amidst such dismal Objects? Was it more necessary to use Spurs for them, than Reins for the Huguenots? Montluc and Tavares, and several other Commanders of the same Party, make it appear, that it was the Baron Des-Adrets's own Fault. At the Bottom, he did the Protestants more wrong, than he thought: and the Bishop of Meaux knew how to take advantage of the Disposition, he ascribed to them, of having been full of Passion, and Revenge (35). But here is another Reason more false, than That which he gave to d'Aubigné. "Never

"any Man acquired so great a Reputation in so short "a Time; and never any great Commander lost it

"sooner: For the Duke of Nemours, who was sent "against him, and who could not defeat him by

"open Force, had no sooner brought him over to "his Party, but they represented him as the weakest, "and most unfortunate, Officer, of the Royal, and "Catholic, Party. Not but that he had always the "same Valour, and Experience; but there is a great "Difference between fighting for, and against, one's

"King: For every thing is permitted in a Revolt; "and a Commander shews himself such as he is; "whereas, in the Service of his Prince, he must ap- "pear such as he ought to be; and he is more sub- "ject to Military Discipline. In effect, the Baron

"Des-Adrets was as furious, as valiant; he signalized "himself more by the Terror of his Arms, than by "the Reputation of his Conduct; and he made more "Noise, than other Men of his Quality, because "he was more cruel, and dreadful. In the King's "Army, they would not have suffered his Fury; "and the Law of Reprisals was so punctually ob"served, that both Parties were obliged to keep "Faith, and to wage a fair War (36)." Though it be my Interest to find Faults in Authors, since They are so many Materials for my Work, I am truly concerned, that so judicious a Person, as Mr le La- "boureux, should have published such bad Reasoning. Ask him, Why Des-Adrets was a great Commander during his Protestantism, and a very pitiful Officer in his Catholicism? He will answer you; it is be"cause, in a Revolt, a Man does all that he can do; "but, in a lawful War, all that he ought to do. There was never a more false Maxim, or more injudiciously applied, than This; since it is certain, that, in a Civil-War, the King's Party acts with more Bold-

"ness, and Confidence, than the Other: For the re- bellious Party, finding itself sufficiently odious, will not begin the Breach of Military Discipline, the Vio"lation of Capitulations, Slaughters in cold Blood, against the public Faith, &c. It is the Prince's Party, which gives itself more Liberty, in that respect, pretending to have only to do with People convicted of Felony, and actually under Sentence of Death: It seldom makes a fair War, but when the other Party resolves to use Reprisals. At least, Matters stood so in the Religious Wars, under Charles IX, and, consequently, This Maxim was very ill applied. Be-

"sides, I wonder, that Mr le Laboureux did not take notice of the Passage of Brantome, which he quoted a little after. That Passage is a Parallel between our Baron, and Montluc, wherein, though Brantome makes the latter a little less cruel, than the other, he says, nevertheless, that they might be compared in all things; both very brave, and valiant, both very capricious; both very cruel; both Companions in Piedmont; and both very good Captains. According to Mr le La- "boureux's Maxim, Des-Adrets would never have ac"quired the Reputation of a great Captain, if he had always served his Prince: Why, then, did Montluc ac"quire That Reputation, or why did he preserve, and perfectly maintain, it, even when, according to Mr le Laboureux, a fair War, and the Law of Reprisals, were punctually observed? Why then did Des-Adrets lose all his Reputation, since That of Montluc was not lessened?

[I] The Protestants disapproved of — his barbarous Conduct.] Besides what has been already said on this Subject (37), I shall observe, here, that it was said, that he taught his Children to be cruel, and to bathe themselves in Blood (38). The eldest, who was afterwards a Catholic, was very busy in the Massacre of Paris. He died at the Siege of Rochel, with Con"struction for the great quantity of Blood, that he had shed. The Protestants are little concerned, whether This Hear-say of Brantome be true, or not; for They were the first, who condemned This Baron's cruel Dis"position (39). But every Body is concerned not to suffer the Licence of Him, who published the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary: He says, That, after a great Slaughter, Des Adrets made his two Sons bathe them"selves in the Blood of the Catholics. Father Maim- "bourg supplied him with This Gloss (40). Both of them should be told, that they ought not to take so great a Latitude in their Paraphrases. that he would fit out a Fleet, to pay the Pope a Visit. We shall speak of his Children in one of our Remarks [K].

Here is a Supplement, which I borrow from a Work, which I have read since the first Volume of This Dictionary was printed off. The Baron Des-Adrets, being but fifteen Years of Age, was One of the Two hundred Gentlemen of Dauphiné, who were in the Army, which Odet du Foix, Lord of Lautrec, commanded in Italy, in the Year 1527 (k). He signalized himself every-where. In 1532, he obtained the Standard of the Company of the Lord Depuy S. Martin, Lieutenant in the Government of Provence (l). He had some Dispute with George d'Urre de Venterol, to whom That Company was given in the Year 1537, and who hindered him from obtaining the Lieutenantancy (m). This displeased him so much, that he protested he would serve no more, and retired to his Father in Dauphiné. Some time after, he went to Turin, to his Uncle Boutieres (n), General of the Army of Piedmont, who left him the Conduct of some Legionaries of That Province, which made part of the Garrison of the Town. He continued in this Employ till the Disgrace of Boutieres, which happened in 1544, and which obliged the Uncle and Nephew to retire into Dauphiné (o). A long Sickness hindered our Baron, above three Years, from bearing Arms. He had a Troop of Horse under the Marshal de Brissac, Lieutenant-General for the King in Italy (p), and was afterwards made Colonel-General of the Legionaries of Dauphiné (q). He received three Wounds, at the Siege of Vulpian, in the Year 1555. The Charge of Colonel of the Legionaries of Provence, Lyonnois, and Auvergne, was given him; and he led them, with those of Dauphiné, to the Duke of Guise, at Turin, in the Year 1557 (r). He lost his Baggage, and his Liberty, at the taking of Moncalve, in the Year 1558 (s), and accused Pequigni, who was Governour there, of the Loss of that Town. He cited him before the King, and lost his Cause [L]. His Repentment,

[K] We shall speak of his Children in one of our Remarks.] Brantome, whom we have quoted concerning the eldest, says, That there was a younger, who was the King's Page; but Beza will tell us more Circumstances about him. "The greatest Evil, says he, speaking of This Baron (41), was, that, growing worse and worse after this, he forsook the Reformed Religion, and carried his Children to Mass; the eldest of which, having been bred up in Germany, during the Troubles at the Court of the Elector Palatine, became, soon after, one of the most vicious young Men in France; but God did not let him live long. The other two were Twins, and were born at Geneva during the Troubles, to one of which John Calvin was God-Father." Mr Allard relates, that He, who had been the King's Page, and of whom he mentions a very bold Action, "was involved in the Massacre on

Mr le Laboureur said, in 1658, that the Family of Beaumont was extinct (48). I have been informed, by Mr d'Hofier, by means of a Friend, that Suzanna de Beaumont, Daughter and Heiress of our Baron Des-Adrets, was married to César de Vauverre, Lord of Teis, and St Desfer, in Dauphiné. Their Posterity continues to this Day. Mademoiselle Des-Adrets, who died Maid of Honour to the Duchess of Orleans, after the Year 1680, and who had been a Protestant, was descended from This Suzanna. Her Brothers were the Marquis Des-Adrets, who is Captain of a Ship, and the Chevalier Des-Adrets, who was Aide de Camp of the Marshal Duke of Noailles, when he was killed at the Siege of Roset, in June, 1693. He had been Captain of a Ship; but was captured, because he would not assist at the Lectures, which Mr Renaude, Engineer of Marine, read at Brest, by the King's Order.

I shall insert here the Addition, which I published at the end of the first Volume of this Dictionary. It contains these Words: I have just now received (49) the Life of our Baron Des-Adrets, composed by Mr Allard, wherein Mr le Laboureur's Mistake is thus laid open. "The Family of Beaumont is not extinct, "as Mr le Laboureur believed, speaking of the Baron Des-Adrets, in his Additions to the Memoirs of Castelnau. It continues still in the Branches of Pompignen in Languedoc, of Bresset, in Auvergne, of Auticamp, and of St Quintin, in Dauphiné. It is true, that That of Baron Des-Adrets ended in two Daughters, the eldest of which, whose Name was Suzanna, was twice married; the first Marriage was with the Lord of Tarvanas, in Piedmont; and the second with César de la Vauverre, to whom she brought the Seat of Des-Adrets. The Baron, having accused Pequigni of the Loss of the Town, and of his Liberty, and Baggage, pretended, that he ought to endemnify him for the Damage he had sustained: For this end, he summoned him before King Francis II, who had succeeded Henry II, where he maintained his Cause admirably well, and said, that Pequigni suffered the Enemy to enter without Opposition; that he might easily have defended the Breach, since it was but small, and the number of those, who refor it, against the House of Guise was managed by Catherine de Medicis (t), and had the Consequences, which we have already seen. The Author, whom I quote, gives a very particular Account of it, as also of This Baron's Actions, which he performed after his Return to the King's Party. He makes them more considerable, than other Historians do; but he owns, that this brave Captain was suspected of Intelligence with the Huguenot Party, that he was imprisoned, that he justified himself [M], and received Orders to raise a thousand Foot, which he conducted to Turin (u). He was there during the Massacre on St Bartholomew's Day. He soon returned into Dauphiné, and, seeing the small Account they made of him, he retired to la Frette (x), in the Graisivodan (y). He refused to sign the Formularies of the League, in the Year 1577 (z). He went to compliment the Duke of Mairenne, at Grenoble, in the Year 1581 (aa), and performed, there, an Act of his ancient Valour [N]. He accompanied la Valette, who was sent into Dauphiné against Lef-digueres, in the Year 1585 (bb). At last, being tired with so many Fatigues, oppressed with Age, and extremely disgusted with the World, he retired again to la Frette, where he lived a Year with visible Marks of his Return into the Bosom of the Church. He died, therefore, a true Catholic, after having made his Will, the Second of Febr. 1586, and was buried in a Chapel of the Parochial Church, which belonged to his House (cc). The Reader will not be displeased to see the Titles, which he gave himself, whilst he was at the Head of the Protestants of his Province [O], nor to know, that his Countenance discovered the Fierceness of his Temper [P].

"solved to pass through it, very inconsiderable; that, if he denied it, he would make him confess it in a Duel. This Dispute appeared singular to the Court; and these two Enemies had some Friends among the Great Ones, who hindered the Decision of it for some time. It went, nevertheless, in favour of Pequiri, by the Credit of the House of Guise, which began to be very great in France; and they were forbid to attempt any thing against each other, on the Penalty of being punished as guilty of High-Treason: Whereupon, the Baron was so enraged, that he swore he would be revenged on the Guises; and This was the Reason, why he embraced, afterwards, the Protestant Party: This is what Thuanus says; and it is agreeable to Truth (51)."

[M] He was suspected of Intelligence with the Huguenot Party, was imprisoned, and justified himself. At his Return into Dauphiné, after the Battle of Moncontour, "he was obliged to retire to his House, because Gordes, Governor of the Province, had conceived a great Hatred against him (52). It is thought, that he suspected him of being still inclined to the Huguenot Party, and even of having favoured the Armament, which was made, near Geneva, by Count Lodowick of Nassau, and of holding Intelligence with him. — Whatever there was in it, it is certain, that Gordes made but little account of him; at which the Baron murmured highly, and made some Complaints, which were somewhat bold, and even rash; which coming to the King's Ear, Gordes received Orders to cause him to be arrested; which he did. He was carried to Grenoble, and from thence to Lyons, and imprisoned in Pierrefise. At first, he was thought a lost Man, and so much the more, because Letters were intercepted from Princes, and the Admiral, in his Favour, and because the chief Heads of the Protestants interceded for his Liberty (53). He obtained it by the Peace, which was concluded in the Month of January, 1571 (54). He appeared before the King in his Council. "There he declared, that, being innocent, he supplicated his Majesty to suffer him to renounce the Benefit of the Edicts of Pacification, made in favour of those, who had acted against his Interests, under Pretence of Religion or Policy; that he had never done any thing, for which he might be blamed; that, if any Person was so bold as to maintain, that he was criminal in any respect, he was ready to make him deny it, Sword in Hand, if his Majesty would be pleased to permit it. The King answered him, That he was persuaded of his Innocence, and good Intention; that he had never questioned his good Conduct, and Zeal for his Service; that he was extremely satisfied with him; that he always believed his Intentions were good, and other things of that Nature, of which he desired his Majesty to grant him an Act: Which was willingly done. It is in the Registers of the Chamber of Accounts (55)."

ing at Grenoble, in 1581, the young Pardaillan, Son of la Motte-Gondrin, spoke haughtily and injuriously of the Baron Des-Adrets, because of the Loss of his Father at Valence. The Baron was informed, in his Retirement, what Terms he made use of, and also, that he said, if he met him, he would abuse him: Which obliged him to come to Grenoble, where, having waited upon the Duke of Mairenne, and having been kindly received by him, he said, several times, and also in the Presence of Pardaillan, that he had left his Solitude, and was returned into the World, to see if any One bore him any Grudge, and to give him Satisfaction; that his Sword was not so rusty, nor his Arm so weak, or his Strength so much impaired by Age, but that he was able to give Satisfaction to all those, who had any Complaint against him. Pardaillan neither said, nor did, any thing, that might give occasion for a Quarrel; so that Des-Adrets retired again, being satisfied with this last Bravery (56)."

[O] The Reader will see the Titles, which he gave himself, whilst he was at the Head of the Protestants of his Province. They are as follows: "Francis de Beaumont, Lord Des-Adrets, Gentleman in Ordinary of the King's Chamber, Colonel of the Legionaries of Dauphiné, Provence, Lyonnais, Languedoc, and Auvergne, Governor, and Lieutenant General for the King in Dauphiné, and my Lord the Prince of Condé's Lieutenant in the Christian Army, assembled for the Service of God, the Liberty and Deliverance of the King, and the Queen-Mother, the Preservation of their States and Grandeur, and of Christian Liberty in the said Countries (57). In the Chamber of Accounts of Grenoble, "there are several Ordinances drawn up in his Name — — — wherein he takes That Quality upon him, and, in others, he calls himself, Chief Governor of the Companies assembled for the Service of God, &c. There are some, which are thus directed; To all the True and Faithful Subjects of the King, our Sovereign and Natural Lord, associated in the Confession of the Reformed Churches, and Well-wishers to the Peace and Tranquillity of this Country of Dauphiné, Greeting, and Peace through our Lord Jesus Christ (58)."

Was he not a very fit Person to use such Language? Was he not a new Apostle, well qualified to imitate St Paul's Evangelical Salutation? [P] His Countenance discovered the Fierceness of his Temper. Thuanus, who observed him so nicely, at Grenoble (59), in the Year 1572, that he was able to delineate him by Memory, so as any one might know him again, gives this Description of him: "Erat jam totus canus, sed cruda adhuc ac viridi senectute, Oculis truculentis, naso aquilino, facie macilenta, sed ruboribus interfusa, ut lutum sanguine maceratum, quod in P. Corn. Sulla observatum est, ori inspersum diceret, de cætero corporis habitus proflus militari (60). — — — He was now quite grey-headed, but of a vigorous and robust old Age; he had fierce, sparkling, Eyes, a sharp Nose, a lean Visage, but flushed; so that you would say, "as BEAUNE (RENAUD de) Archbishop of Bourges, and, afterwards, of Sens, in the Reign of Henry IV. See SAMBLANCAI (WILLIAM).

BEDA (NOEL), Doctor of Divinity in the University of Paris, was the greatest Clamourer, and the most mutinous and factious Man, of his Time. He was a Picard (a), and lived in the Reign of Francis I. He declared himself a sworn Enemy to all those, who designed to make Learning flourish again (b); and it was on this score, that Erasmus, and Faber Stapulensis, incurred his Indignation. He pretended to have found a great many Heresies in the Paraphrases of Erasmus, and published a Book on that Subject. Erasmus justified himself, and, accusing him in his Turn, convicted him of a great number of Calumnies [A]. Beda, instead of proving, that he had been no Calumniator, or, instead of confessing, that he had not rightly apprehended his Adversary's Meaning, had recourse to the Art of Caballing: He read Erasmus's Books over again; he made new Extracts out of them, as unfaithful as the former [B], and gave them to be censured by the Faculty of Divinity; where his

[A] Erasmus convicted him of a great Number of Calumnies. See the Book entitled, Supputationes Errorum in censuris Natalis Bedæ per Erasmus Rotterodamum. It was printed in the Year 1527. The Reverse of the Title page will inform you, that Erasmus found One hundred eighty one Lies, Three hundred and ten Calumnies, and Forty seven Blasphemies, in a pretty small Book of his Censurer; and This, without dealing rigorously with him; for he was spared in many things, which deserved to be taken notice of. "Ac ne quis queratur iniquam supputationem, non imputavimus illi tam multa indocte, stulte, & sine mente dicta. Non imputavimus tam multas propositiones, quas in censuris omisit, &c. (1). ----- And, left any one should think my Computation unfair, I have not charged him with many things, unlearnedly, foolishly, and inconsiderately, advanced. I have not imputed to him the many Propositions, omitted by him in his Censures, &c." A Man of Honour, and Conscience, would have made it his chief Business to vindicate himself against such kind of Lists; but Beda, and Those like him, find their Account better in repeating their first Accusations an hundred times over, just as if nothing had been answered to Them. If Erasmus may be credited, his Adversary's Book displeased Francis I. so much, that he prohibited the Sale of it. "Impotenter & infeliciter edito libro sic debacchatus est in me, ut Rex Christianissimus mox, ubi rem cognovit, veterit codices divendi, haud dubie vetiturus excludi, si tempestive monitus fuisset (2). ----- He railed so against me, in a weak and unfortunate Work, that the most Christian King, being informed of it, immediately prohibited the Sale of the Book, and, no doubt, would have put a Stop to the printing of it, had he had timely Information." The Book, which Beda published, at the same time, against Faber Stapulensis, was likewise prohibited; nevertheless, the Copies of these two Books were suffered to be dispersed. "Urit hominem, quod liber, quem in Jacobum Fabrum scripserat, edicto regio suppressus est, etiam si non est suppressus (3). ----- He is nettled at the Royal Edit, which suppresses his Book against James Faber, though, in Reality, it is not suppressed." "Nec jussu premere prestiti, sed elusit Regis edictum, curans ut in Germaniam spargeretur, & illic clam distrahatur (4). ----- Though commanded to suppress the Book, he did not obey, but eluded the King's Edit, contriving to have it dispersed, and privately sold, in Germany. I shall set down, here, a Passage of Mr Chevillier's Book about the Origin of Printing at Paris. "Francis I. ----- was so exasperated against Dr Noel Beda, who had refuted the Paraphrases and Annotations of Erasmus, and against the Faculty, who had approved, and caused his Book to be printed (5), that, the Doctor, being gone to the Court about some Business of his Society, was kept Prisoner there for a whole Day, not obtaining his Liberty, but on Condition to appear whenever it should be required, and a Letter under the Privy-Seal was sent to the Parliament, dated from Amboise, the ninth of April 1526, whereby they were ordered to put a Stop to the Sale of Beda's Book.

"I have read, in a Copy of the Registers of that Court, a Letter of Jodocus Badius, wherein he says, that he had printed Six hundred and fifty Copies of This Book, many of which had been sent into Spain, Italy, Germany, and England; that he had about fifty complete Copies left, and promised not to distribute them (6). ----- Moreover, Lewis de Berquin, a private Lutheran, and a Friend of Erasmus, with whom he held Correspondence by Letters, presented twelve Propositions out of Beda's Book, pretending they contained some Impieties, and Blasphemies, and required, that the Faculty should be obliged to condemn, or prove them by the Holy Scripture. The King heard this Accuser favourably; and, the tenth of July 1527, he sent the Propositions, by the Bishop of Bazas, to the Rector, whom he ordered to cause them to be examined by the four Faculties assembled together, and not by the Doctors of Divinity only, quos in hac materia suspectos habebat, as the Register of the Faculty says, ----- I find no written Account of what the Judgment of the four Faculties was (7). Take notice, that the Divines of Paris had rendered themselves so much suspected of Passion and Anger, that the King would not permit them to be Judges in This Cause, without joining with them the three other Faculties. It will not be amiss to see in what manner he bridled These Zealots: Here is an Extract of the Letter, which he wrote to the Parliament, the ninth of April 1526. "And, because we are duly informed, that the said Faculty, and their Agents, write indifferently against every Body, slandering their Honour and Reputation, as is done against Erasmus, and may endeavour to the like against others, We command you ----- to write immediately to Those of the said Faculty, or their Deputies, and to forbid them ----- to write, compose, or print, any thing whatsoever, either in general, or in particular, before it has been revised and approved by you, or your Deputies, and debated in a full Court (8). These Regulations did not continue long, though they seemed worthy of a general and perpetual Establishment.

[B] He made new Extracts out of them, as unfaithful as the former. The more he found himself convicted of Calumny, the more he endeavoured to ruin him, whom he had calumniated. He, therefore, resolved to try, whether, by producing the same Accusations a-new, under a Form somewhat different, he might not have a better Advantage of them. "Urit hominem ----- quod ego respondens & meam innocentiam & illius impudentiam sic omnibus ob oculos posui, ut in speculo non possit evidenter. Itaque prorsus animo gladiatorio parat vindictam, non se purgans, quod non potest, sed easdem calumnias alia specie rursus ingerens. ----- Habet sexcentas propositiones de paraphrasis decerpitas ----- eas ut narrat ad Facultatem deferret, & in aliquot jam audio pronunciarum. Sed quomodo proponit artifex? Omittit quæ rem explicant, quæ calumniam excludunt: addit de suo quæ faciunt ad calumniam: proponit velut à me dicta hoc tempore quæ dicuntur ab Evangelistis aut Apostolis, & ad Ecclesiæ primordia pertinent (9). ----- He is vexed, his fiery Temper, and his factious and violent Declamations against the Novelities of those Times, and against Those, who were not zealous enough to suppress them, gave him a kind of tyrannical Sovereignty [C]. This he abused in such a manner, that, at last, they were obliged to give him up to the Secular Power, which, to

"to find my Innocence, and his own Impudence, represented, in my Answer, as faithfully, as in a Glass. He, therefore, prepares, with the Fury of a Gladiador, to take his Revenge, not by vindicating himself, which is out of his Power, but by repeating the same Accusations under another Form. . . . He has selected Six hundred Propositions out of my Paraphrases. . . . he presents them, they say, to the Faculty; and, as I am informed, Judgment is given upon some of them. But how does This crafty Fellow propose them? He omits whatever tends to explain the Matter, or to remove Scandal: he adds of his own what contributes to Calumny: he proposes, as if advanced, at present, by, me what was said by the Evangelists, or Apostles, and related to the Infancy of the Church." Beda omitted none of the knavish Tricks of an unfaithful Maker of Extracts. He suppressed what was proper to justify the Accused Person, and to discover the Calumny: He added what would strengthen his Accusations; he turned to one Sense what had been said in another. There is nothing more easy, than to cause an innocent Opinion to be condemned by such Artifices: See the Seventy third Letter of the nineteenth Book of Erasmus. He contrived another Artifice; for he made choice of some Heads of Accusation, and, having put them into French, he sent them to the Court, to incense the Great Men, the Women, and all France, in general, against Erasmus (10). He had already alleged the Title of King of France, which Erasmus gave to the King of England, in dedicating a Book to him (11); I say, he had already alleged it, to render this poor Author odious at the Court of the Most Christian King. I do not know, whether any one told him to his Face, that he was very much in the wrong, not to endeavour, before all things, to justify himself; and that it was disgraceful to leave Erasmus's Lists unanswered, such Lists as convicted him plainly of gross Errors, and shameful Calumnies. "Quum meæ supputationes, ob oculos omnium posuerint hominis inficitum cum pari malitia conjunctam, non cogitat de purgando, sed articulos aliquot deceptos ex acervo calumniarum & Gallicæ verfos misit in aulam regiam. . . . Nunc eisdem articulos vobis ingerit, scilicet in ordinem digestos, ut novi videantur, perinde quasi nihil sit responsum (12). — Though my Computations plainly discovered the Ignorance and Malice of the Man, yet he never thinks of justifying himself, but, selecting some Articles out of an Heap of Calumnies, he turns them into French, and sends them to Court. — Now he repeats the same Articles to you, drawn up in such an Order, that They may appear new, as if they had never been replied to." He should have answered This without having recourse to so many unfair Practices. Perhaps Erasmus was the only Person, who reproached his Adversary with This. "Nisi Beda prorsus disliceret suæ causæ, responderet saltem ad quædam loca tam impudenter calumniosa vanaque, ut res manibus, quod aiunt, sentiri possit. Nunc, hoc omisso, quod in primis curatum oportuit, vim parat, conceitat facultatem, ut articulorum turba, suffragiis, & autoritate, me opprimat (13). — Did not Beda entirely distrust his own Cause, he would at least reply to some Passages, so impudently scandalous and false, that the thing may be felt, as the Proverb has it. But, having omitted This, which was his principal Concern, he now prepares Force, and stirs up the Faculty, to oppress me by a Multitude of Articles, by Votes, and by Authority." I say, Erasmus was perhaps the only Person, who reproached him after This Manner; for, commonly, They who are not concerned in the Injustice of an Inquisitor, govern themselves by the Rule of Thinking more, than Speaking.

[C] His factious Behaviour — gave him a Kind of tyrannical Sovereignty, in the Faculty of Divinity. I do not know, whether any thing is more difficult, than to obtain an equitable Judgment, in a Process of Doctrine, against such a Man as Beda. He was naturally violent; he indulged this violent Disposition with the greater Licence, as he covered himself with the fair Pretence of the Interest of Truth: He boldly defamed his Adversaries in his Books: He called moderate Persons base Prevaricators, which was a good means to oblige part of the Judges to side with him against their Consciences; for there is no pleasure in exposing one's self to be defamed by the Assessors of an Inquisition: In a word, it was the ready way to tyrannize over the Faculty of Divinity. Here is the most faithful Description, which can be seen, of the manner, how a Man of Beda's Stamp may extort an Academical Decree, a Synodal Sentence, &c. Michael Angels never painted more to the Life. "In omni consensu semper fuerunt, qui studiis & improbitate rerum summam sibi vindicant, nec temere fit, ut melior pars vincat. Per illos primum res privatim decernitur, mox excluduntur integriores, adhibentur idonei, præfatio commendat concordiam, adduntur minæ; hic, inquit, apparet, qui sint Lutherani factionis. Si quis dixerit aliquid æquius, mox audit à frementibus, Luthero pejor. Sunt ingenia modesta, quæ malunt quiescere, quam cum talibus contentionem suscipere. Sunt qui in gratiam privatam defleant à sua sententia: sunt qui metuunt aut sperent aliquid, eoque premant quod judicant optimum: sunt qui non intelligant, quod nudè proponitur: sunt qui iidem affectibus exæccati sunt, quibus Beda: sunt quos utunque sanos clamor ac tumultus aliorum, ita ut fit, agit in furias. Ita non fit, sed extorquetur senatusconsultum. In quo prodendo rursum qui extorserunt admittunt affectus suos, aliis vel incisus, vel conniventibus. Et hoc dicitur collegii decretum (14). — In every Assembly, there have been Men, who, by dint of Industry and Dishonesty, gain a Superiority over the rest; nor is it without cause, that the better Part prevails. Every Thing is first determined in private by these Men; afterwards Those of Integrity are excluded; such, as are for their Purpose, only admitted; they begin with recommending Unanimity, and end with Threats; Now, say they, we shall discover, who are of the Lutheran Faction. If any one delivers himself with more Moderation, than usual, presently it is murmured, that he is worse than Luther. There are moderate Tempers, which chuse to be quiet, rather than contend with such Persons: Others there are, who sacrifice their Opinion to private Favour: with some, Hope or Fear prevails, and induces them to stifle what they judge to be best: Some do not understand what is nakedly proposed: others are blinded by the same Passions with Beda: There are, who, though sound of Mind, are driven to a Kind of Madness by the Clamour and Noise of Others. Thus a Decree is not made, but extorted. In the framing of which, They again, who extorted it, intermix their own Passions, the rest either not perceiving, or conniving at it. And This is called A Decree of the Faculty." What he says in the fourth Fol. of his Supputatio Errorum in censuris Bedæ, is, likewise, a true Picture. "Deliguntur Deputati ad id idonei, quos optant ii, quorum auctoritas vel improbitas vincit in collegiis, in quibus frequenter, quod ait Livius, major pars vincit meliorem, nonnunquam minor sed importunior superat & majorem & meliorem. Allegatur Relator. Decernitur. Interim cum scribis res est. Et hinc insulsiuntur quædam obiter, quæ vel non sentiuntur, vel dissimulantur. — Deputies are pitched upon, proper for the purpose, who are chosen by Those, whose Authority, or Knavery, has acquired a Superiority in the College; in which, as Livy observes, The greater Part prevails over the Better, and sometimes the Less, but more importunate, conquers the Greater and Better. An Informer is appointed. A Decree is drawn up. In the mean time Scribes are employed. Hence some things are frequently repeated, which are either not perceived, or are connived at." That, which is to be lamented, is, that the Management, described in this Passage, is put in practice, even when the Question is to condemn what deserves it most. See the Complaints made against the Censure of a Book of Mary d'Agreda (15). Observe, that our Beda accomplished his Design:

to punish him for his high Offences, condemned him to make the Amende honorable, and to confes, at the Gate of the Cathedral Church of Paris, in the Presence of a great Number of People, that he had spoken against the King and the Truth. He was, moreover, condemned to Banishment (c). This happened in 1535. He had very much opposed the Design, which Francis I had, to cause the Sorbonne to give a favourable Opinion for the Divorce of Henry VIII. He was not in the wrong in the main; for all, that was done to corrupt some Universities in France, was a true Mystery of Iniquity; but he ruined his Cause by his Passionate Behaviour, and his mutinous Carriage [E]; and even involved himself in the sign: The Faculty of Divinity censured Erasmus's Book, the Twenty seventh of December, 1527. It is true, This Censure was not made public till four Years after (16).

[D] He was condemned to make the Amende honorable.] Bartholomew Latomus, who was then at Paris, wrote this News to Erasmus. "Beda tuus fecit emendam, ut vocant, honorabilem, cum hac confessione quod contra veritatem & Regem loquutus esset, quæ verba ante ædem divæ Virginis magno populi concursu præcone palam pronunciavit: ne forte Lutheranism illum fuisse putes. Sed tamen detinetur adhuc in carcere, detrudendus in Monasterium aliquod, ut ferunt, ubi & quando Regi visum fuerit. — Your Beda has made the Amende honourable, as they call it, with this Confession, that he had spoken against Truth and the King; which words he pronounced openly at the Door of the Cathedral of the blessed Virgin, with a Cryer preceding him, and before a great Concourse of People: This I inform you of, that you may not think he was a Lutheran. However, he is still kept in Prison, to be thrust into some Monastery, they say, where and when the King pleases." This Letter of Latomus, dated the Twenty ninth of June 1535, is the Twenty seventh of the Twenty seventh Book of Erasmus.

SOME FACTS concerning Beda, in the Affair of the Divorce of Henry VIII.

[E] He spoiled his Cause by his passionate Behaviour.] Messieurs de Bellai, who concerned themselves extremely in the good Success of Henry VIII's Divorce, speak very ill of Beda in their Letters. "I have never yet seen This King (of England), nor those that are in Credit with him, in so fair a way, as they are at present in; to which what your Divines have done has wonderfully contributed, according to the Advice, that is come from the Embassadors. But there is one Beda of That Number, who is a dangerous Person; and there would be no need of having many such in a good Company." This is what John du Bellai, Bishop of Bayonne, wrote from London to Mr de Montmorency, the Twenty ninth of December 1529 (17). His Brother, William du Bellai, wrote to Francis I, the ninth of June, 1530, that Beda had committed great Disorders in the Assembly of the Faculty. "During which Discourses, says he, and whilst their Beadle was collecting the Names and Opinions of the Deliberators, to see what the Opinion of the Majority was, one of the said Gentlemen, our Masters, stood up, and took the Roll out of his Hand, and tore it; and thereupon, they all arose in great Disorder and Tumult, some beginning to cry out, that they had done and spoke enough about it, and that the greatest and foundest Party was of Opinion to deliberate no more about it, without writing to you, Sir, and to the Pope. In this manner the Company departed; and the King of England's Embassadors, who were walking in a Gallery, seeing them come out in such disorder, and with such a noise, and hearing all the Discourse, which passed between them, retired very much displeased to their Houles, putting a very ill Construction upon this Business. And they told me, they knew very well heretofore, what were the secret Practices of Beda, and his Accomplices, to render the Consultation such as they had found it (18)." Du Bellai adds, I. That, at his Request, the first President sent for Beda, Barthelemy Tabary, and some other Ringleaders of this Discord and Faction, and made them promise, that they would meet again the next Day. II. That the same first President "made the said Beda come to him in the Church of our Lady, about another Circumstance, and remonstrated to him his Abilities, and the Inconvenience, to which he might put the King, and was so urgent with him, that he swore expressly, not only not to hinder the King's Letters from being obeyed, but to use his Endeavour, as if it were for his own Life, to make the thing pass without noise or scandal (19)." (20) Ibid. III. That, though, "at first, he would not trust too much to this Promise, so far as it was, notwithstanding another Promise formerly made to the great Master, the said Beda had begun this Faction, without which the Business might have been determined without any trouble to the King. Nevertheless, seeing the first President would trust to Beda for it, he (du Bellai) would not write again to the King about it." The Letter of the fifteenth of August of the same Year is curious. Du Bellai informs Mr de Montmorency, I. That the Business had been carried on by such wicked Intrigues, that, says he, I have often seen the King's Business in danger to suffer greatly by it; and I assure you, that, if I had not daily made use of the Assistance of the first President, who, besides the Authority of his Place, has great Credit with the said Beda, and his Accomplices, such an inconvenience would have happened by the Attempt of a foolish, I dare not say an ill, Man, that the Ability of a thousand wife Men would hardly have remedied it without extraordinary Trouble; and perhaps any other Judge, not infected with the Persuasion, which I perceive in the said President, that the before mentioned Beda, when he speaks Theologically, is infallible and impeccable, would have called That a Mortal Sin, which the said President can hardly believe to be a Venial Sin: However, the King has appointed Commissioners to enquire into the Abuses and Intolerances of the said Beda, and his Accomplices." II. That the English Embassadors had obtained an Order, from Francis I, to the Beadle of the Faculty of Divinity, to give an authentic Duplicate of some Act signed with Beda's own Hand; and that they had addressed themselves to the King, because to have it "by the leave of the Faculty, was to go back to A, B, C, considering the Tyranny heretofore usurped by the said Beda, and his Adherents." III. That the first President (20) "is so much persuaded of the Sanctity of Beda, that he cannot believe the Faults he sees in him, which are such, to speak the Truth, that, if I had committed such in self, and had a dozen Heads, I should have deserved to lose them all; as any Body may see, that will read the Legend, which the two Presidents, le Viste, and Porellot, will make of them. Nevertheless, My Lord, I do not conclude, that the said Beda is the only wicked Person; for he has Companions enough, that would be glad to give the King occasion to do something hastily against them, to acquire the Name of Martyrs with the Mob. I had often heard of their malicious Undertakings under the Title and Colour of Honesty and Hypocrisy; but I could never have believed the tenth Part, if I had not seen it (21)." These words are worth their weight in Gold; for they wonderfully represent the Character of many of those turbulent Zealots, who cause a thousand Disorders in a State, by the desire they have to domineer over the Multitude, and who willingly expose themselves to Persecution, that the People, interlarding themselves in their Disgrace, may make an Insurrection, and finish what their Intrigues have begun. The Bishop of Bayonne, in his Letters to Mr de Montmorency, confirms the greatest Part of what his Brother had written: "The Business of the King of England, says he (22), was proposed at Paris, after it could be deferred no longer; Beda played the Devil there, and the Assembly broke up without coming to any Conclusion; the King will have them begin again, and, if it be necessary, to send the Crime of Perjury. He had much Credit with the first President Lizet (d), a Man much more fit to act the part of a bad Controvertist, as he did before his Death, than to be at the Head of the first Parliament of France. Beda was one of the chief Promoters of the Death of Lewis de Berquin, as we shall relate in the Article of That Protestant Martyr. In general, there was no one in Paris, who shewed more Violence against Those, who are called Heretics, than himself (e); and This is the reason, why Beza (f) ascribes the Punishment, which was inflicted on Beda, of being confined to Mount St Michel, where he died the eighth of January, 1537 (g), rather to the just Judgment of God, than to That of Men. He had been Principal of the College of Montaignu. You will find, below, the Titles of his Works [F].

BEDELL (WILLIAM), Bishop of Kilmore, in Ireland, was born in the Year 1570, at Black Nottey, in Essex. He studied at Cambridge, where he took his Bachelor's Degree, in the Year 1599. He left That University to exercise the Ministry at St Edmundsbury, in Suffolk, which he did very zealously, without any Interruption, 'till he was made Chaplain to the Ambassador, whom King James sent to the Republic of Venice (a). During his eight Years abode at Venice, Bedell contracted a very intimate Friendship with Father Paul, and, when he returned into England, he brought the famous Mark Antony de Dominis along with him, as also several Manuscripts, of Father Paul's, and, among others, The History of the Council of Trent. He returned again to St Edmundsbury, and, amidst the Functions of the Sacred Ministry, he translated into Latin The History of the Interdiction, and That of the Inquisition, which Father Paul had given him; and dedicated them to the King. He translated, also, the two last Books of The History of the Council. In the Year 1615, he was provided with a considerable Benefice, in the Diocese of Norwich, which he possessed twelve Years, applying himself very much to his Duty, and caring but little to make a noise in the World. He was so little known, that no one could give any Account of him to Diodati, a Divine of Geneva [B]. Nevertheless, his Reputation reached into Ireland, where, with a general Consent, he was nominated to the Headship of Trinity College (b). He would not accept of This Place, without the Command of his Superiors; and, being commanded to do it by King James, he joyfully obeyed, and discharged the Duties of That Employment to Admiration. Two Years after, he was promoted to the Bishoprics of Kilmore and Ardagh, in the Province of Ulster, being, then, in his Fifty ninth Year (c). He found These two Dioceses in great Disorder, and was very active in reforming Abuses. He began with the Plurality of Benefices, and, to set a good Example, he resigned the Bishopric of Ardagh, and kept only That of Kilmore. He made some Regulations as

(c) It must be, then, in the Year 1629.

[A] Bedell contracted a very intimate Friendship with Father Paul.] The Intimacy, which This Famous Venetian Divine had with William Bedell, was without any reserve; he discovered his Heart to him, which was more imbued with the Faith of the Reformed Churches, than with That of the Council of Trent. Nothing, perhaps, more clearly evinces Father Paul's reformed Faith, than the Particulars, which Dr Burnet published in the Life of our Bishop of Kilmore: I shall speak at large of it in another place (1). I shall only observe here, that Father Paul assisted Bedell in learning the Italian Language, and that Bedell helped the other to learn the English Tongue. Father Paul confessed, that he received from him some other Instructions, which were more considerable: See, hereafter, the Remark [H]. I add, that Bedell translated the Liturgy of the Church of England into Italian; and that he had the Liberty of conferring with Father Paul when, and as often as he would, even when none but Persons known to him were suffered to come near him, by reason of the wounds, which That Father had received (2).

his Office so worthily, one cannot say of him, that he was little known, without extolling to the Skies, at the very same time, his Modesty, Humility, Disinterestedness, and several other truly Pastoral Virtues, and very rarely to be found. Where are there Churchmen of great Abilities, who do not endeavour to make a Noise in the World, but chiefly to reach the Ears of Princes, and Favourites? Let us set down Dr Burnet's Remark: "Diodati, says he (3), That famous Divine of Geneva, being come into England, could meet with no one, who could give him any tidings of him, though he was very well acquainted with the Clergy. He was much surprised, that such an extraordinary Man, so much admired in Venice, so tenderly cherished by Persons of the greatest Merit, should be so little known in his own Country: he had lost all hopes of seeing him, when, merely by accident, he met him in the Streets of London, where they expressed their great Surprise and Joy to each other. Diodati presented him afterwards to the learned Dr Morton, Bishop of Durham, whom he informed of the particular Esteem, which Father Paul had for him; and That Prelate gave him a very favourable Reception."

(3) Burnet, ibid. pag. 33.

[B] No one could give any Account of him to Diodati.] What I say here would be no Encomium of a Person of little Merit; but, as to our Bedell, who was an able Divine, and a Minister, who performed to Residence: He was very zealous for the Conversion of the Roman Catholics, and, thinking, that nothing could contribute more to it, than a Translation of the Scriptures into the Irish Language [C], he caused it to be undertaken. This Buſi-neſs met with many Obſtacles. He expreſſed a great Zeal for the Re-union of the Lutherans and Calvinists [D]. He did not approve of Thoſe, who made uſe of a paſſionate Style againſt Popery [E], and did not think them fit to undeceive Thoſe, who erred. He took a quite different Method: He was a Man of an Apoſtolic Charity;

- [C] He ſet on foot a Translation of the Scriptures into the Irish Language. He had learned That Language; "and, though he was too old to ſpeak it, yet he underſtood it ſo well, that he made a compleat Grammar of it, which, it is ſaid, was the firſt that ever was made (4)." In favour of the new Converts, "he cauſed the Common-Prayers to be read every Sunday in Irish, and aſſiſted at them himſelf. — The New Teſtament, and the Liturgy, had been already tranſlated into Irish; but, judging, that the Old ought no longer to remain untranſlated, he ſought for ſome one, who was "Maſter of that Language, to tranſlate it (5); —
"and, calling his Eyes upon one King," aged about ſeventy Years, he put him into Orders, provided him with a Living, and deſired him to ſet about it. This Perſon, not underſtanding the Oriental Languages, was obliged to tranſlate it from the Engliſh; His Work was reviſed by Bedell, who, after having compared the Irish Tranſlation with the Engliſh, compared the latter with the Hebrew, with the LXX, and with the Italian Verſion of Diodati. When This Work was finiſhed, he reſolved to be at the Charge of the Impreſſion; but his Deſign was ſtopped: Advice was given to the Lord Lieutenant, and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, that it would be a ſhameful thing for a Nation to publiſh a Bible, tranſlated by ſuch a de-ſpicable Man, as King was (6). There was a Clergyman, who obtained the Benefice of This old Man, and thruſt him out of it with Ignominy and Violence (7). He was not only deprived of it, but alſo attacked in his Reputation. "It is uſual, ſays Dr Burnet (8), for thoſe, who commit an Injuſtice, to juſtify it by another, to load their Adverſaries with Calumnies, and frequently to repeat their Accuſations, in order to prepoſſeſs the People againſt them, and to oppreſs them ſo much, that they "may not be able to obtain any Redreſs, but entirely ſink under ſuch a weight of Malice." Bedell uſed all his endeavours to prevent the Oppreſſion of This poor Tranſlator, and prepared Matters to have the Irish Bible printed in his own Houſe; but the Troubles followed; and he did not live long enough to execute his Reſolution. The Manuſcript was not loſt; for, by the Diligence of the famous Chriſtian Philosopher, Mr Boyle (9), they were printing of it, when Dr Burnet publiſhed the Life of our Biſhop (10).
[D] He expreſſed a great Zeal for the Re-union of the Lutherans and Calvinists. He was not contented to impart his Thoughts by Letters to Mr Dury, but did alſo aſſiſt him in the Expence, he was obliged to be at, to negotiate this Union, and gave him an annual Penſion of Twenty five Piſtols, which he paid regularly to his Correſpondents in London (11). This Mr Dury's Name in Latin is Duræus: The pains, he took, to execute his Project of Re-union, are almoſt incredible. I believe, without making much hate, he took as many Journeys, as the Jeſuit Matthieu, who was called The Poſſibility of the League. They may be compared in ſome things; but they differ in many others. One was the Miniſter of a League, which was already formed, and which, being actually in Arms, had none but violent Deſigns.
The other was the Miniſter of a meer national Confederacy, which was only to be built on the Moderation of Men. So that it is no wonder, if one of them rode Poſt, and the other travelled at his leisure. There is, among the Treatiſes, which Du-ræus publiſhed in 1662 (12), William Bedell's Opinion on the Queſtions, which the Undertaker of the Re-union had propoſed to the Divines. This Prelate made it appear, that he was fit for ſuch an Undertaking. A great Number of Lutherans, being ſettled at Dublin, reſuſed to communicate with the Church of Ireland. They were ſummoned before the Archbiſhop's Council; They answered, that the German Divines did not find, that the Preſence of JESUS CHRIST in the Eucharift was taught, conformably to their Doctrin, by the Church of Ireland. The Archbiſhop ſent them to the Biſhop of Kilmore; who gave them ſuch a ſolid Answer, that the German Divines, who ſaw it, adviſed the Lutherans of Dublin to communicate with the Church of That Place. Dr Burnet ſays upon This, that the Church of England has given no poſitive Definition of the manner how the Body of CHRIST is preſent in the Sacrament: So that Men of different Opinions may praſtiſe the ſame Worſhip, without being obliged to declare themſelves, and without any Preſumption, that they all againſt their Belief (13). I have always heard it ſaid, that there would be no better way to prevent Schiſms, and Diſputes, than to avoid Particulars, and to allow of as General Formulæ as may be.

[E] He diſapproved of thoſe, who made uſe of a paſſionate Style againſt Popery. He preached one Day, among other things, as follows: "Give me leave,
"my Brethren, to ſpeak my Thoughts freely; I "am very ſenſible, it will diſpleaſe many Perſons;
"but That ſhall not hinder me from diſcharging my
"Conſcience; and I hope Men of Underſtanding "will not take it amiſs. I have long ago been of "Opinion, that the manner, in which many Per-
"ſons treat their Adverſaries, in their Writings,
"and in their Sermons, deſerves Cenſure; They "give a looſe to their Pens, and Tongues, and what "they ſay is only a Series of Calumnies, and in"jurious Language; They think they have done
"Wonders, when they imitate their Enemies, or "when they ſurpaſs them in them in That Way, in "which He, who does the beſt, does, really, the "worſt; they endeavour to juſtify their Proceedings
"by the Text: Answer a Fool according to his Folly,
"without conſidering the other Text, Answer not a "Fool according to his Folly, leaſt thou become like "unto him. But they are, ſometimes, the more in"excusable, becauſe, not underſtanding their Ad-
"verſaries Opinion, or, at leaſt, diſguiſing, and making "it more unreaſonable, than it is, the Proofs, which "they bring, have nothing that is ſolid, and con-
"ſiſt only in paſſionate Words about ambiguous
"Terms, which each Party takes in a different
"Senſe (14). — Let us not envy the Papists, and "other Heretics, the Glory of outdoing our Adver-
"ſaries in railing; becauſe the more one excels in "this Art, the more one is learn from the great "Pattern of Charity, who ſays, Learn of me, for I "am meek and lowly in Heart (15). — It is not
"with ſharp and cutting Expreſſions, but with ſolid
"Reaſons, that Error is to be confuted. — It is our "Duty to confound Error, not to cavil, or "to rail. It is ſaid, that Alexander, having heard
"one of his Soldiers ſcoff at his Enemy Darius, re"primanded him ſmartly in theſe Words; Friend,
"*I liſted thee to fight againſt Darius, and not to treat
"him unworthily, as you do* (16). But, in truth,
"JESUS CHRIST, our Captain, is but little obli"ged to Thoſe, who treat their Adverſaries in this "manner; and it is very probable, that, if he was yet
"on Earth, he would ſay to them; Preachers of my "Gospel, I am willing you ſhould reſuſe Popery, and "that you ſhould oppoſe my Enemy Antichriſt, and "all the Sects, which fight under his Banner; but I "have not called you to give them ill Words. Theſe
"are my Sentiments concerning the manner, in which "we ought to treat Thoſe of the Romiſh Com"munion: Perhaps they do not conform to the Practice
"of Luther, Calvin, and ſome other great Men.
"But our Conduct muſt not be regulated according "to the Example of others: They were Men; and "perhaps they had the failure of too warm a "Zeal (17)."

Charity; and it was his kind Usage of the Papiſts, which, with the ſpecial Protection of God, ſaved him from their Fury [F], when they made ſuch a Maſſacre in Ireland, in the Year 1641. His Houſe, where ſeveral Perſons had taken Sanctuary, was ſpared for two Months; and, at laſt, when the Papiſts reſolved to employ Force againſt Thoſe Perſons, they had ſuch a Regard for him, as to deſire him to ſend them away; which if he did not, they declared, that they had Orders to ſeiſe him. But he choſe rather to give himſelf up to the Diſcretion of the Rebels, than to put thoſe out of his Houſe, who came for Refuge there. So they took him Priſoner, with his two Sons, and brought them, with thoſe few Perſons, that were in his Houſe, to the Caſtle of Lochwater. He had the Liberty to preach in his Priſon; and, a little while after, he was ſet at Liberty, with his two Sons, by an exchange of Priſoners. He was carried to the Houſe of an Iriſh Miniſter, and died within a few Days (d), with the moſt Chriſtian Diſpoſitions, that a true Prelate can have. His End answered the good Life he had led; he was the greateſt Example, that theſe latter Ages can parallel with the holy Paſtors of the Primitive Church (e). The Iriſh Catholics, whoſe Hatred for the Proteſtants, and Spirit of Rebellion, inſpires them with more Fierceneſs, than the Nature of their Climate, and Education, admired his Virtue, and gave him very ſignal Marks of their Reſpect, on the Day of his Burial [G]. His Learning was great [H]; and he would have teſtified it to the Public by a greater Number of Books [I], if he had printed all Thoſe, which he compoſed. They were almoſt all loſt; for the Rebels ſcattered his Papers, and his whole Library. He was Seventy two Years of Age, when he died, and was yet very vigorous; neither did he uſe Spectacles (f).

Houſe of Commons in Ireland, where there were many Papiſts. Dr Burnet's Judgment upon it is well worthy of attention. He gives us, ſays he (18), ſuch a fine Method of handling Controverſies, that the Advice will, I think, be found to be as extraordinary, as it is little praſtized.

[F] It was his kind uſage of the Papiſts, which ſaved him from their Fury.] Their Bitterneſs, (I make uſe of the Biſhop of Salifbury's Words) was not ſtrong enough to reſiſt the Sweetneſs, which he had ſhewed on all Occaſions, and which made them ſay very often, that He ſhould be the laſt Engliſhman, who ſhould be driven out of Ireland. He was the only Perſon in the County of Cavan, who was not diſturbed in his Houſe, nor in the Church-yard, or Church, which were full of poor perſecuted People (19). When the Rebels ſent him Word to diſmiſs all thoſe, who ſheltered themſelves under his Roof, they added, That, as he had done good to ſeveral People, and had not diſobliged any Body, they had more regard for him, than for any Engliſhman in Ireland (20). See the following Remark.

[G] The Iriſh Catholics ----- gave him very ſignal Marks of their Reſpect, on the Day of his Burial.] The titular Biſhop of Kilmore had taken poſſeſſion of the Biſhopric: It was neceſſary to deſire his leave, that Biſhop Bedell ſhould be buried in his Church-yard: He alledged, at firſt, that it was holy Ground, which ought not to be prophaned by ſuch Burials; but, at laſt, he granted all that was deſired, and, accordingly, on the ninth of February, 1642, "the Body of the deceased was buried near that of his Wife, as he had deſired in his Life-time. On this ſad Occaſion, the Iriſh would pay him extraordinary Honours; The Chief of the Rebels drew up his Troops, and made them accompany the Corps in great Ceremony, from Mr Shereden's Houſe, to the Church-yard of Kilmore; They would alſo have had Mr Clogy (21), perform the Office, according to the Liturgy of the Church of England; but, though the Gentry would have paid him this Compliment, it was not thought fit to make uſe of it, for fear of ſtirring up the Rage of the Mob, which was already too much exasperated. When the Body was laid in the Ground, they fired a Volley, and cried out in Latin, requieſcat in pace ultimus Anglorum. — Peace be with the laſt of the Engliſh; and, indeed, they had very often pro-teſted, that they had more Conſideration for Bedell, than for any of the other Engliſh Biſhops, and that he ſhould be the laſt that ſhould be removed from them (22)."

(21) He had been Miniſter of Cavan, and had lived a long time with William Bedell. It is ſe, who in ſiſhed Dr. Burnet with Memoirs, to write this Prelate's Life.

Criticifms, that he had not well underſtood certain Paſſages; and was very much pleaſed to learn the true Senſe of Them, which This learned Engliſhman ſhewed him (24). Marc Antony de Dominis deſired the ſame Doctör to examine the ten Books of his Eccleſiaſtical Republic. "Bedell corrected many Miſ-applications of Scripture, and many Quotations of the Fathers, in it; for That Prelate, being altogether ignorant of the Greek Tongue, muſt needs have committed a great many Faults;" the Number of which was ſo great, that Bedell could not correct them all (25). He obſerved ſome Miſtakes, in the Works of the learned Uſher, Archbiſhop of Armagh. "They were neither many, nor of any great Moment; but, becauſe they did not anſwer the uncommon Exactneſs of That great Man, he thought he was obliged to point them out to him: which he did; and the Archbiſhop received his Cenſure with his uſual Mildneſs, and Humility (26)." He ſtudied much, "and chiefly the original Text of Scripture, of which he had ſo often read the Hebrew, and the Greek of the LXX, that he had them as fluent as the Engliſh Tranſlation (27)."

(28) This is what I find in the French Life of Mr. Bedell, pag. 26, 27. Now This is to ſuppoſe, that This Work of Father Paul is divided into but four Books; but all the Editions that I have ſeen conſiſt of eight Books.

[I] He had compoſed a greater Number of Books.] I have ſaid, in the Body of this Article, that he publiſhed a Latin Tranſlation of ſome of Father Paul's Works. I muſt obſerve, at preſent, that Marc Antony de Dominis was much better ſatiſfied with Bedell's Tranſlation, than with That of Newton. The latter tranſlated the two firſt Books of The Hiſtory of the Council of Trent; and the other tranſlated the two laſt (28). Bedell publiſhed a Book of Controverſy in the Year 1624, and dedicated it to the Prince of Wales. This Book was a Confutation of ſome of Wadſworth's Letters. This Wadſworth, Fellow Student, and Chamber-Fellow of Bedell, was provided with a Benefice in the ſame Dioceſe with Bedell, and was ſent into Spain, about the ſame time, that Bedell was ſent to Venice (29). I ſay, he was ſent into Spain, in the ſame quality of Chaplain, and to teach the Infanta Engliſh, when her Marriage had been agreed upon with King James. He ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded to forſake his Religion and his Country, and publiſhed ſome Letters, containing the Motives of his Change (30). Bedell confuted them. It is believed, that his Anſwer had ſome Effect on Wadſworth's Heart, though it did not induce him to make an outward Profeſſion of the Reformed Religion. It is thought ſo, becauſe the Son of this new Catholic came to Bedell at Kilmore, and told him, "That his Father had ordered him to return him Thanks for the Pains he had taken to inſtruct him; that he read his Book continually, and he had heard him ſay ſometimes, after the reading of it, that he would make his eſcape." Bedell mentions a Diſcovery, which was made, of the Number of the Beſt, in the Inſcription of a Theſis, dedicated to Pope Paul V (31). It was found, that the numeral Letters of theſe Words, Paulo V. Vice Deo made 666; but he does not pretend pretend to be the Author of the Discovery: However he was so (32), and he did Father Paul, and other Divines of the Republic of Venice, a very great Pleasure, when he communicated it to them (33). He wrote a very long Treatise on these two Questions: Where was the Reformed Church before Luther; and what was the Fate of Those, who died in the Bosom of the Church of Rome, before the Reformation? He was resolved to publish it; and the Learned Archbishop Usher often pressed him to it: The Irish Rebellion occasioned the Loss of This Work (34), and of a great Collection of critical Expositions on different Passages of the Scripture, together with his Sermons, and learned Paraphrases on all the Epistles and Gospels of the Day, according to the Liturgy of the Church of England (35). The Irish seized on them, and the other Manuscripts, whereof there was a great Clift full; only his great Hebrew Manuscript was fortunately taken out of the Hands of these profane Men, and is preserved in the Library of Emanuel College. This good Luck happened by means of an Irishman, whom he had converted, who, mixing with the Rebels, brought away This Manuscript, and some other Books, with him. One would be apt to believe, that it is the same, which is mentioned in the Twenty fifth Page. Now it is said there, that Bedell bought, of Rabbi Lee, chief Chabam of the Synagogue - - - the fine Manuscript of the Old Testament, which he gave to Emanuel College; though he had a great Value for it; for it is said, that it cost him it's Weight in Silver.

BEGAT (JOHN), Counsellor in the Parliament of Dijon, was deputed to Charles IX, in the Year 1563, to present an Address to His Majesty, against the Edict, which granted the Protestants the Exercise of their Religion, after the first Civil-War. The States of Burgundy were resolved not to suffer the Assemblies of the Protestants, notwithstanding That Edict; and, to make the Court approve of it, Begat was sent thither, who spoke vigorously on That Subject. Afterwards he published an Apology, wherein he pretends to shew, by several Arguments, that Two Religions ought not to be suffered in one State, and that Toleration is offensive to GOD, and against the Public Peace. The Protestants published a Writing against it (a) [A].

[A] He published an Apology - - - the Protestants published a Writing against it.] I have not yet seen any Catalogue of Authors, who make any mention of This Work of Begat; which made me resolve to find it out: besides, we shall see, in this Article, the little Regard, they had then in France, for the Royal Authority. The Province of Burgundy did not only refuse to comply with the King's Pleasure; but decided, after a mature Deliberation, in the Assembly of the States, that they would not obey his Will. When such things as these are represented to the French, since the Revolution, which happened in England, in the Year 1688, they know not what to say, and could wish, that the Proofs of these Reimonsances were no where to be found. I have the Reimonsance of Begat, in Latin, printed at Cologne, in the Year 1564. It is entitled, Responsum conventus trium ordinum ducatus Burgundiae de edicto pacis nuper in causa religionis factae, ad Christianissimum Galliarum Regem, Carolum Nonum, anno 1563. I wonder it should be so little known; for it was translated into several Languages, as I have just now seen, in the Paradoxical Miscellanies of Peter de

St Julien. The Passage is so curious, that it deserves to be produced entire. "To speak of a more recent Affair, when the Parliament of Burgundy, assembled at Dijon, deputed Mr John Begat, Counsellor in the same, to lay before the King the Reasons, why That Court had not proceeded to the Publication of the Edict of January (1), (where the said Begat spoke so well, and so learnedly, that no other Reimonsance was better received in our Time: which may be judged so, because the same French Reimonsance has been translated into Latin, Italian, Spanish, and High Dutch) it happened, that the said Begat fell into private Discourse with the Chancellor of l'Hospital, on the same Subject; and, as the Counsellor insisted upon the Privileges of Burgundy, and said, that the King had sworn, and promised, to observe them, the said Sieur de l'Hospital (as knavish, as a Chancellor) replied, that it did not belong to Subjects to act against their King ex sponta (they were his Words); and that all Contracts of Sovereign Princes with their Subjects bind them no longer, than they think fit (2)."

(1) I believe he was sicer, and that he confounds the Edict of January, 1561, with the Edict of Pacification, of the Month of March, 1563.

BELLAÏ, an illustrious and ancient Family in Anjou, which has produced some great Men. See, in Moreri, a long Series of the Genealogy of the du Bellai's, and a pretty large Account of the Persons of That Name, who have most distinguished themselves. I shall avoid Repetitions, as much as I can, in speaking of William du Bellai, and of his Brother John du Bellai: I mean, that, as far as can be done, I shall omit what Moreri has already mentioned.

(a) He found the French of Langei.

BELLAI (WILLIAM du), Lord of Langei, was Son of Lewis du Bellai (a), and of Margaret de la Tour-Landri. He did Francis I great Services, both by his Courage, and Parts; he was no less a good Captain, than an able Negotiator; and his Pen was as good, as his Tongue, and his Sword. His Dexterity in penetrating into the Intrigues and Designs of his Enemies, by his Spies, was surprising. See, in Moreri, what Brantome said of him, and add to it, what I relate below [A]. He was

[A] His Address, in penetrating into the Designs of his Enemies, was surprising: add to it what I relate below.] Francis de Billon observes, that the Lord of Langei never began the Execution of any Military Undertaking, before he had made use of his Pen to discover the State of things (1). He reports, afterwards, these Words of Charles V. Langei's Pen has fought more against me, than all the barbed Lances of France (2). He commends This Lord's Secretaries very much; for, after having spoken of a Person, who offered Two thousand Crowns of Gold, in vain, for a Copy of a Letter, which a Cardinal had written to Francis I, he adds, that This "Person went away confounded, as having presumed, that he had to do with such good Merchants, as Thoe

"of the late Marquis du Guesst, whom a Secretary of the famous Langei (whose Name was Landry), by the Help of Money, founded to the very Bottom of their Thoughts: which he did out of Affection to a Master, who, in Cafe of Necessity, had a voluntary Sacrifice made him of the Hearts of his Secretaries, and other Gentlemen: Hence it is, that The Saying, Langei's Education, is still used in many Places, to his Praise, and to put France in Mind of the serviceable Persons of that Time (3)." If the Author, who has spoken so much of the great Effects of the Pen, and alleged so many Examples of it, had known what I have now quoted, he would have adorned his Work, entitled Arma Auserina, with it (4).

was one of the chief Springs, which moved some Universities of France to vote according to the Passions of Henry VIII, King of England, when That Prince resolved, by way of Divorce, to quit his Wife, and be at Liberty to marry Anne Bullen. It was the Interest of France to favour the King of England, in this Matter; for the divorcing of Queen Catherine was an Affront to the Emperor, and a Pleasure to Henry VIII. This Affront on the one Side, and Pleasure on the other, were very proper to form a strict Alliance between the King of England, and Francis I; which was the reason, why William du Bellai used his utmost Endeavours in Favour of Henry VIII. He was sent several times to the Protestant Princes of Germany: He dexterously warded off the Blows, which were aimed at him there, in relation to the Severity, with which his Master punished Heretics [B]. He was made a Knight of the Order, and Lieutenant General in Italy. He had composed An History of his own Times [C], in Latin, divided into Ogdoades (b), and, afterwards, by the King's Order, he translated it into French: Somebody stole this Work; so that the Public has been deprived of it, except some Fragments, and three or four Books, which MARTIN DU BELLAI, the Author's Brother, inserted in his Memoirs [D]. You will see, in the Remarks, what Judgment Montagne passed on This

(b) La Croix du Maine imagined, falsely, that William du Bellai had wrote a Book, entitled Ogdoades, which was different from his History of France.

[B] He dexterously warded off the Blows, which were aimed at him in relation to - - - the Punishment of Heretics.] See the Substance of his Speech in the ninth Book of Sleidan: It was not possible to make a more artful Apology, than That, which he made for the Punishment, which Francis I, had inflicted on some of his Subjects, who had embraced the new Opinions. But Lange's Conversations were, at least, as artful as his Speeches: he conferred with the Doctors, and consult to them, that, on divers Points, the Opinions of the King, his Master, did not much differ from Those of a Book, which Melanchthon had published (5). Father Maimbourg was very angry, upon this Occasion, with Sleidan. "How " is it possible, says he (6), that the Lord du Bellai (7) " could have said so false a thing and so contrary " to all Probability? He, who, in the beginning of " That same Year, had followed the King in a famous Procession, where That Prince showed so much " Zeal for the Catholic Religion, and, after which, " he caused six Men, convicted of Lutheranism, to be burnt alive, with a slow Fire. One might as " well ask, how can a cunning and dexterous Embassador make use of any Disguise, when he desires to obtain things of great Importance, which " a sincere Acknowledgment would infallibly make " him lose?" Father Maimbourg confesses (8), that du Bellai declared, that They, who were punished in France, were such as the Protestants of Germany would not acknowledge. The same Jesuit does not censure Sleidan for having said, that du Bellai protected the King his Master had not declared against Lutheranism, by the Punishment, to which he had condemned some of his Subjects, and that none but malicious Calumniators could be guilty of so extravagant an Assertion. " Illum animadvertisse quidem in sua ditionis quosdam: sed hoc ad ipsorum injuriam nullum pertinere, tamen malevoli dicant quum illos medio sustulit ipsorum quoque causam veluti prejudicio quodam condemnasse: " rogat autem ne tam ineptis calumniis moveantur (9)." Father Maimbourg must therefore have believed, that The Embassador spoke in this Manner: Now what can be said more contrary to Sincerity, more false, and more unlikely? Was it not notoriously known, that, at Paris, they gave no more Quarter to the Lutherans, than to the Zuinglians? See what has been said, on all this, against Father Maimbourg, in the Critical Answer to his History of Calvinism (10). We have, here, an Article of the Religion of Sovereigns, and of the Embassadors Catechism; which is, That Heresy ought to be persecuted at Home, and carelessly in foreign Countries, in order to stir up a Civil War in a State, which it is their Interest to weaken, or in order to make an advantageous Alliance. It is the Embassador's Trade to act according to the Doctrine of Equivocations; and it should have been chiefly invented for them. But, to go on, Sleidan's Honesty has been displayed in its full Lure by Mr Seckendorf. He quotes William, and his Brother John du Bellai's Letters, written to Melanchthon; wherein they assured him of the good Sentiments of Francis I (11). Nay, he quotes a Letter, which That Prince wrote to the League of Smalcald, to excuse the Punishments in question (12). The Confederate Princes were plainly imposed upon; and were made to believe many things, to hinder them from coming to an Accommodation with Charles V. A Modern Historian (13) observes, that William du Bellai's Discourse to the Faculty of Divinity at Paris, assembled to deliberate on the Divorce of the King of England, was all a Cheat: And why should he have been more sincere to the Prejudice of Francis I, in Germany?

[C] He composed An History of his own Times in Latin.] Scævola Sammartbanus was much mistaken, when he said, that This Work was the History of France, from the beginning of the Monarchy, to the time of the Author. Historiam de rebus Gallicis ab ipsa imperii origine ad sua usque tempora, tum Latinè tum Gallicè, gravissimo stilo perfectus est (14). If he had read the Prefaces, he would not have said so; for William du Bellai declares, in express Words (15), That his Memoirs begin with the Infancy of Francis I. He adds, that he had, at first, prefixed to them, by way of Introduction, a Discourse about the Origin of the Gauls, and French, and the Reduction of Those two Nations into one, which threw off the Roman Yoke; but that, afterwards, he laid aside That Discourse, and enlarged it so much, that he made a separate Work of it, and one of the seven Ogdoades, which made up his History. He treated, in That Ogdoad, I. Of the Antiquity of the Gauls and French; II. Of the Division of Gaul and France; He gave, there, a Geographical Description, and reconciled the Modern Names with the Ancient, as well as he could; III. Of the Laws and Customs, as well Military, as Political, and of the Offices, and Dignities. He accommodated the Time past to the present, as well, and as near, as he could (16). Martin du Bellai does no less clearly condemn Scævola Sammartbanus. " My deceased Brother, says he (17), " Messire William du Bellai. - - - had composed " seven Latin Ogdoades, which he translated, by the " King's Order, into our Vulgar Language, where " in might be seen, as in a clear Glass, not only " a Picture of the Occurrences of THIS AGE, " but also a wonderful Dexterity of Writing, according to the Judgment of the most Learned." If it had been a complete History of the Monarchy, would he have recommended his Brother's Memoirs by the sole Occurrences of this Age, and by the Style?

Note, That the Work of the Antiquity of the Gauls, and French, is so full of Fables, that one would think the Author did not so much design to write a History, as to forge a Romance. Non Francogalliae historiae, sed Amadisicarum fabularum instituisse traditionem videtur. Thus Francis Hotman speaks of it, at the end of the fourth Chapter of his Francogallia.

[D] Of which there remain - - - three or four Books, which MARTIN DU BELLAI - - - inserted in his Memoirs.] He was both a Soldier and an Author, as well as his Brother. He was Knight of the King's Order, Captain of the fifty Men of Arms of his Ordinances, and his Lieutenant-General in Normandy. He left some Memoirs, which reach, from the Year 1513, when he came to Court, to the Death of Francis I. " They are, says he (18), Memoirs both of Peace and War, of which I can partly speak as an Eye-witness; for I was personally

This Book [E]. The Prologue contains very important Pieces of Advice to Historians, and very solid Reflexions on the Indignities, which are offered to History [F]. It is through a palpable Mistake, that a Book, concerning Military Discipline,

- "sonally present, in several Places, on this, and the other, side of the Alps; and, as for the rest, I could have certain Advice from those, who were present." Of the ten Books, which make up This Work, there are but three, which belong to William du Bellai, if we may rely on the Title-page, on the Preface of Martin du Bellai, and on the Title of the Prologues of the Ogdoades: But, if we consider the Running-title, and the particular Title, which is at the Head of each Book, we shall find, that the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth, Books belong to William du Bellai, and that the first, second, third, fourth, ninth, and tenth, belong to Martin. That, which belongs to William, is taken from the fifth Ogdoade, and reaches from the Year 1536, to the Year 1543 (19). The whole Work of William consisted of seven Ogdoades; but the first did not relate to Francis I; It treated of the Antiquities of the Gauls and French, &c. as I have already observed (20). The other six were designed for That Monarch's Reign. The ten Books, which remain, written partly by William, and partly by Martin, were printed at Paris, in the Year 1569, in Folio, by the care of René du BELLAI, Baron de la Lande, Son-in-law of Martin. Some quote an Edition of Paris, in Folio, in the Year 1572. I have seen one, which was printed off at Paris, the twentieth of October 1587, in Folio, by Peter de Voinart, the King's Mathematical Printer, and was sold by Peter de Fuillier. Du Cbesne, in his Bibliothèque of the Writers of the History of France (21), says, that there is a Geneva Edition, in 8vo, 1594; but he says nothing of That of Rocheb, 1573, in 8vo. Hugh Surcau translated This Book into Latin, and published it at Frankfort, in Folio, in the Year 1574. Martin du Bellai died at Glatigni, the ninth of March, 1559 (22). He had married Isabella Cheneu d'Yvetot, and, by This Marriage, he became Prince of Yvetot (23).

MORERI judged ill of the Style.

[E] What Judgment Montagne passed on This Book:] These are his Words (24). "It is always pleasant to see things, written by those, who have experienced how they ought to be managed; but it cannot be denied, that a great want of That Freedom, and Liberty, of writing is evidently discovered in Those two Lords, which is conspicuous in the old French Writers, as in the Sire de Joinville, Domestic Servant of St Lewis, Eginard Chancellor of Charmagne, and, of later Memory, in Philip de Comines. We have, here, rather a Plea for King Francis against the Emperor Charles V, than an History. I do not believe they have altered any thing as to the main; but they make a Trade of judging of Events, often against Reason, to our Advantage, and of omitting all that is ticklish, in the Life of their Master; witness the removal of Messieurs de Montmorency and Brion, which is here forgotten; nay, the very Name of Madam d'Esclamps is not to be found in it. Private Actions may be concealed; but, to pass over in Silence, what every Body knows, and Matters, which have produced such public Effects, and of such great Consequences, is an inexcusable Fault. In short, to have a full Knowledge of King Francis, and of the Things, which happened in his Time, you must look elsewhere if you will believe me. The Advantage, which may be reaped from the reading of This History, consists in the particular Account of the Battles, and War-like Exploits, wherein These Gentlemen were present, in some private Sayings, and Actions, of some Princes of their Time, and in the Practices, and Negotiations, conducted by the Sieur de Langey, where there are many things, which deserve to be known, and Discourses, which are not vulgar." If Moréri had read the Memoirs of these Gentlemen, one might very well say, that he knew but little how to judge of Books; for he says, the Style of William du Bellai is pompous, and magnificent; and such as Persons of Quality ought to write in. First of all, it is certain, that the Style of This Illustrious Person is not pompous and magnificent; it is incorrect; and it does not appear, that the Author took any pains about it; besides it is full of broken

Latin Terms; which shews, that the Author does himself Justice, when he declares, that he had no regard to the Perfection of the Style. In the second place, Persons of Quality do not write in a pompous Style; It is not by this Character, that one may discover, whether an Author be a Person of Quality, or not: A professed Rhetorician, or preaching Monk, write an hundred times more pompously, than a Courtier.

[F] The Prologue of his Ogdoades contains very important Pieces of Advice to Historians, and very solid Reflexions on the Indignities, offered to History.] There never was more occasion to attend to This, than at present; but the worst of it is, that most of those, who are guilty of the Faults, censured by William du Bellai, do not commit them through Ignorance. It is Malice, Animosity, or the Desire of pleasing the People, and of getting Money by it, which engage Writers to falsify their Relations. Whatever may be the Cause of This Disorder, I shall set down a long Passage of This Author. He observes, very judiciously, That it is necessary, that They, who are acquainted with Affairs, be speedy in publishing Them; for, otherwise, it becomes too difficult to trace things back to their Original. "Slowness in History, says he (25), is of so much the more dangerous Consequence, because the Lives of Mortals are short: and, if nothing be committed to writing by those, who know, and remember, the Affairs of their Times, They, who come after, though they are Masters of a good Style, and use Diligence, cannot write with certainty, and agreeably to the Truth. This we may, already, have observed in some of the last preceding Years, of which to speak truly, and at large, is a difficult Matter, partly through the Negligence, and partly through the Rashness of the Historians themselves, who, nevertheless, complain, that they have not Materials, worthy of their Studies, and Labour; but they would have done better, both for themselves and us, if they had written nothing, rather than have published under the Title of an History, a Parcel of fabulous and lying Stories, of which we have, at this Day, a greater Plenty, than we have of true Histories. I have read, in some Chronicle (which I believe some will think to be a Dream) that a King of France, after Dinner, chased a Stag from Compiègne to Loudun, which is about 100 Leagues. Every one knows, that the virtuous, and praise-worthy, Prince, Charles, Duke of Orleans, after he had been thirty Years a Prisoner in England, for the Service of the Crown of France, at last returned home, and died, loaded with Years and Honour: yet we read, in more than twenty Authors, that he was beheaded at Paris for High-Treason. Did not the last King of Scotland die in a Battle against the English, in the Year 1514? and yet I have read, that he returned Victorious, and Triumphant, into his own Kingdom. I avoid Prolixity, in recounting a great Number of these Lies, which are certainly published only through the Rashness, Carelessness, and Indiscretion, of Those Historians, and Writers of Chronicles, who, oftentimes, deliver That for certain, which they first heard, without having any regard to the Credibility of the Person, who related it to Them; or else by setting down what is commonly reported among the People; which, generally, has very little Truth in it: from whence it proceeds, that Readers, who are better informed, are not very willing to believe other good ancient Authors, thinking that they wrote after the same manner. Thus, in another Case, Cardinal Bessarion (26), seeing so many new Saints canonized at Rome, whose Lives he knew, and did not approve of; These new Saints, said he, make me very doubtful and scrupulous with respect to what is said of the Ancient ones. And I with these Writers of Chronicles would be quiet, or else give Names to their Books, answerable to the Contents, and that Those, who are able and willing to speak the Truth, were so zealous for the Honour and Glory of their Country, as to write in their

Discipline, is ascribed to William du Bellai [G]. I believe he is the Author of the other Works, which are ascribed to him [H]; but I do not think they were ever printed. I except The Epitome of the Antiquities of Gaul, which was printed, with some other small Pieces, in the Year 1556. La Croix du Maine assures us, that "their own Language, what they have seen, or heard, from credible Persons. Then the Men of Letters might enrich their Style, and make it elegant, without the Trouble of searching the Truth amidst so many Lies, Contradictions, and Incon"sistencies, which are published by the said Writers of Chronicles, who foolishly depend upon the Hear"say of the first Person they meet with."

[G] It is through a palpable Mistake, that a Book, concerning Military Discipline, is ascribed to William du Bellai. Du Verdier ascribes This Book absolutely to him; but la Croix du Maine gives us to understand, that he is not sure of it: He neither notes the Year, nor the Place, where it was printed, but says only, That the Instruction of the Military Art is to be found printed under the Name of the said Sieur de Langcy. Du Verdier is more exact: he gives the Title in this Manner: Institutions about War, extracted out of the Books of Polybius, Frontinus, Vegetius, Corna-

(31) This Reason is good for nothing, if it be absolutely upon the Words my Lord: An infinite Number of Authors imitate Julius Cæsar, who speaks of himself in the third Person. Will. Du Bellai followed this Method in his Memoirs.

(32) It has been said to have been Mamili in Refo.

Raimond de Poivre, Sieur de Forquevaux, a Gentleman of Gasconne, is the Author of This Work. He communicated a Copy of it to William du Bellai, as to his good Lord and Friend, and to whose Judgment he had first submitted it. This Copy was found among the Papers of That Lord (33): This is the Origin of the Mistake. If the Author's Kinman had acquainted the Public with the Truth of This Fact, before Nauac published his Synagma de jure militari (34), it is probable, that Synagma would not have retained the common Error, which we find in these Words: "Qui (Etricus Romanus) nunc in Tellina

"Valle sub Christianissimo Rege catinarum præfectus, idem omnino facit, quod quondam in Alpibus Taurinis Guilielmus Bellajus Langcyus, eodem munere defungens, fecerat, cæcis etiam moribus de militari, quos postea Mambrinus Roleus Italica, & omnes ferme populi sua lingua reddiderunt, ob tummam ejusmodi librorum, qui ab expertis & celeberrimis nostra & patrum memoria ductibus comparati fuerunt, utilitatem (35). — W'e (Henry de Rohan) now Marshal de Camp in the Valbeline, under the most Christian King, does the same, which was formerly done by Bellai, Lord of Langcy, having published a Treatise of Military Affairs, which afterwards Mambrinus Roleus translated into Italian, and all other Nations into their respective Languages, on account of the great Usefulness of such Kind of Books, which have been written, in our own and our Fathers' Memoirs, by experienced and famous Generals." Nauac is moreover mistaken, in supposing, that the Books in question were printed during the Life of William du Bellai. He seems to value That Work much. His Judgment was therefore different from That of a Commentator on Onofander, of whom the Baron de Forquevaux complained in this manner: "This Military Discourse is indeed a necessary Work, and useful to those, who profess the Trade of War, and which will continue a long time esteemed, and prized, in the Hands of the most Understanding Men, in spite of the Slanders, and contrary Opinion, of a Modern Author, who, in his Annotations on the Military Art of Onofander, a Greek Writer, strives to despise one, with whom this Author is not to be compared, in this Science, though he wrote more like a Doctor than a Soldier, during the leisure, and idle Time, which the good Table, and the Amours of a certain Abbot with his Wife, afforded him (36), and though he has extracted his Commentaries from divers Authors; whereas the Text of him, whom I am speaking of, was conceived on Horseback, and written, Sword in Hand, by the Sieur de Forquevaux (37)."

What was la Croix du Maine thinking of, when he said, That the Constable, Anne de Montmorency, passed for the Author of the Book in question (38). Did he not know, that the Constable, was a Man of no Learning or Reading, and was not able to write? Let us see from whence his Doubt proceeded: "It is, says he, because, in reading that Book, I found, that the Author of it praises Messire William du Bellai, Lord of Langcy, very much, and recommends him for his Learning and Skill in War; which makes me believe, that he is not the Author of it, but that those Memoirs were found in his Library, without the Name of him, who wrote them, and that it was presupposed it was his own Work, because he had promised to write some Memoirs. I do not assert, that he is the Author of them, neither do I deny it." If he had read the Work well, he would have found stronger Proofs, than That, which he draws from the Praises given in it to William du Bellai.

[H] I believe he is the Author of the other Works, which are ascribed to him. See the Catalogue of them in the French Bibliothèques of la Croix du Maine, and du Verdier. Some of the chief of them were, perhaps, never finished: It is probable, la Croix du Maine gave That for a perfect Work, which the Author only promises in the Prologue of the Og-

(c) La Croix du Maine. Biblioth. Franç. pag. 139. William du Bellai was born about the Year 1498, at Glatigni, in le Perche (c). I believe he is mistaken, as to the Time [I].

[I] La Croix du Maine affirms us, that he was born, in 1498, at Glatigni — I believe he is mistaken as to the Time.] After having said, Page 139, that William du Bellai was born in the Year 1498, or thereabouts, he places his Death, in the following Page, on the ninth of January, 1543, at the Age of Forty seven Years, or thereabouts. Would a Man, ever so little exact, say so? Would he not place, either 1496, on one side, instead of 1498, or 45 on the other, instead of 43? But this is not the chief thing. Brantome observes, that Langy died, not very old, and might have lived longer (39). Can any one speak thus of a Man about Forty four Years of Age. Moreover, Cardinal du Bellai was Sixty eight Years of Age, when he died (40); now he died in 1560; he was, therefore, born in the Year 1492. It cannot, then, be said, that William du Bellai was born in the Year 1498; for he was older than his Brother, the Cardinal (41). I have just now discovered, that he died in his Climacterical Year. Rabelais observes it, in the Twenty first Chapter of his third Book, after having said, that he died the tenth of January 1543. The Author of the Remarks on the Confession of Sanci gave me notice of this Passage.

BELLAI (JOHN du), younger Brother of the foregoing, was a Man of great Merit. He concurred, with his elder Brother, in favouring the Passions of Henry VIII, and decoying the Protestants of Germany, in order to serve Francis I, whose Affairs required, that a Quarrel should, at any rate, be fomented between the Emperor, and England, by the Divorce of Catherine of Arragon, and that the Confederates of Smalcalde should be amused with Lies, about the pretended Inclination of Francis I, to give the Lutherans some Satisfaction. This Conduct would have been more inexcusable in John du Bellai, who was a Bishop, than in his Brother William, who was a Lay-man; I say it would have been more inexcusable, if That Bishop had not been also an Ambassador, and a Statesman (a). The Definition of Persons, invested with That Character, is well known. Let us add, that it is not unlikely, that John du Bellai had a sincere Desire, and even some Hopes, of a Reformation, and that, upon this Prospect, he sincerely encouraged Melanchthon to come into France; for he inclined, for some time, towards Lutheranism, and even reformed himself privately as to the Article of Celibacy, by a Marriage of Conscience, which he contracted [A]. He was Bishop of Paris, when, in 1534, he was sent to Rome to soften Matters, in relation to the King of England; but he had no good Success, and could not hinder the Pope from fulminating an Excommunication against Henry VIII. He was promoted to the Cardinalship, by Pope Paul III, in the Year 1535, and died, in 1560, at Rome, where he had retired, after the Death of Francis I. He was a Man, who would willingly have quitted the Mitre, and Crozier, to take the Helmet, and Sword [B]. If it be true, that he condemned

(a) He was Bishop of Baïonne, in the Year 1527, when Francis I sent him Embassador into England.

[A] He reformed himself privately, as to the Article of Celibacy, by a Marriage of Conscience.] Brantome affirms it, in this manner: "I have heard a Lady of great and ancient Quality say, That the late Cardinal du Bellai, being Bishop and Cardinal, had married Madame de Chatillon, and died married; this she said, discoursing with Monsieur de Manne, of Provence, of the Family of Seulac, and Bishop of Frejus, who had attended the said Cardinal fifteen Years at the Court of Rome, and had been one of his private Protonotaries; and, happening to speak of the said Cardinal, she asked him, Whether he had never told, and confessed to him, that he was married? Monsieur de Manne was much surprized at this Question. He is yet living, and can tell whether I assert a Lie; for I was there. He answered, That he had never heard him, or others, say so. Well then, I tell you so, replied she; for there is nothing more true, than that he was married, and died really married to the said Lady Chatillon (1)." This Lady was the Widow of Mont de Chatillon, who was wounded before Ravenna, and who died of his Wounds at Ferrara (2). He had been in great Credit in the Reign of Charles VIII. His Widow, young and fair, was chosen Lady of Honour to the Queen of Navarre, and gave her the good Advice which That Queen mentioned in her Hundred Novels. Admiral de Bonivet crept into This Princess's Bed through a Trap-Door, but he got nothing there but a scratched Face (3). The Queen would have complained of this Attempt to her Brother Francis I, if the Lady Chatillon had not given her "This good Advice, which is one of the finest and wisest, and the most proper to avoid Scandal, that could have been given, even by a first President of Paris; and which shewed, nevertheless, that the Lady was as Cunning and Crafty in such Mysteries, as Wife and Discreet; and therefore it is not to be doubted, that she kept her Marriage with the Cardinal very private. — I believe, that the Cardinal, her said Husband, who was one of the "most Learned, Eloquent, Wise, and Prudent, Men of his Time, had taught her to speak so well, and give such good Advice. — I think, the said Cardinal du Bellai might have done it; for, at that time, he inclined much to Luther's Doctrine and Religion (5)."

(5) Idem. pag. 156.

[B] He would have quitted the Mitre and Crozier to take the Helmet and the Sword.] Brantome shall be my Witness again. He says, that, when Charles V so haughtily braved the King of France, at Rome, it was a Misfortune for Francis I, not to have any Ambassadors there, that were Swords-men (6). "And yet, had it not been, continues he, for Cardinal du Bellai, who was as quick, and hasty, as any Military Man, (and indeed he looked like one; for he was qualified for any thing, and one of the greatest Men, both for Learning, and War) things had not gone well there, and the King had been much disgraced. Which makes me think, that there never were any Gown-men, who deserved more to be Ambassadors on all Occasions, than This Cardinal (as he has demonstrated in many Embassies, before he was a Cardinal, in Italy, Germany, and England), and the Bishop of Dax, of the House of Nouailles, in Limousin, who served our Kings worthily in That Station, in England, and at Venice (where I have seen him), and afterwards at Constantinople. I will not wrong many other worthy Persons of their Character, whom I have seen in such a Station; but, in my Opinion, Cardinal du Bellai, and the Bishop of Dax, have surpassed them all; for they could as well have made use of their Swords, as of their eloquent Tongues: And, indeed, an Ambassador is as often obliged to treat of Affairs relating to War, as of State Matters." Thuanus (7) and Sammarthanus (8) have observed, that This Cardinal removed the Fear of the Parisians, who were in dread of Charles the Fifth's Army, and that he prepared all things for a vigorous Defence, having caused the City to be fortified. Moreri has said the same, but with little condemned Anne du Bourg [C] to be burnt, his Vote must have been given at a Distance; for he was at Rome, when the Trial of Anne du Bourg was set on foot.

Exactness: He will have it, that John du Bellai did these things, when Charles V. entered into Provence, in 1537, and that the King, quitting his Capital, left This Cardinal there, and made him his Lieutenant-General, to provide for the Security of Picardy, and Champagne. Here are two Mistakes: The Irruption of Charles V. into Provence happened in the Year 1536; That, which put the Parisians in fear, and occasioned him to order their City to be fortified, happened likewise in the Year 1536 (9); but it concerned Picardy, and not Provence. It is That, which Charles V. caused to be made by the Count of Nassau. Tbuanus (10) refers the Care of Cardinal du Bellai, for the City of Paris, only to the Invasion of Champagne, in the Year 1544. But he is mistaken.

[C] It has been said, that he condemned Anne du Bourg. This is to be found in Mr Teiffier. Many blamed him, says he (11), for being the first, who condemned Anne du Bourg to be burnt alive; for which Reason, say they, God took him out of this World, forty Days after the Execution of This illustrious Martyr. The Calculation would not be right, according to the Annals of Spondanus, who places This Cardinal's Death on the sixteenth of February 1560 (12); for we find, elsewhere, that du Bourg was executed the Twenty third of December 1559 (13). The Author, whom Mr Teiffier quotes, says, that This Cardinal died the sixteenth of February, and fifty Days after du Bourg. His Calculation is less remote from the Truth, than That, which Mr Teiffier imputes to him; nevertheless, it is not exact; and therefore This Observation is chimerical.

BELLARMIN (ROBERT), an Italian Jesuit, was the best Writer of his Times, in Matters of Controversy. He was born at Monte Pulciano (a), in the Year 1542, and admitted among the Jesuits in the Year 1560. His Mother, Cynthia Cervini, was Sister of Pope Marcellus II. He was ordained Priest, at Ghent, by Cornelius Janjenius, in 1569, and, the Year following, he taught Divinity at Lowvain. He was the first Jesuit, who taught this Science in That famous University, and he did it with extraordinary Success. Having lived seven Years in the Netherlands, he returned into Italy, and, in 1576, he began to read Lectures on Controversy, at Rome; which no Jesuit had yet done in That City. He acquitted himself so well, that Sixtus V. sending a Legate into France, in the Year 1590, gave him Robert Bellarmin, as a Divine, who might be very useful, if any Dispute about Religion should happen to be discussed. He returned to Rome, ten Months after, and was successfully promoted to several Offices, either in the Society, or at the Pope's Court, till, in the Year 1599, he was honoured with the Cardinal's Hat. It is said, that they were forced to threaten him with an Anathema, to make him accept of That Dignity. Three Years after, the Archbishopric of Capua was given him, which he resigned, when, in the Year 1605, the new Pope (b) would have him near his Person. He was employed in the Affairs of the Court of Rome, till 1621. Then he left the Vatican, and retired to a House of his Order, where he died, the seventeenth of September, in the same Year 1621. In his last Sickness, he was visited by Pope Gregory XV, whom he entertained with the Compliment of the Centurion [A], Lord, I am not worthy, that thou shouldst come under my Roof. He charged the Jesuit Eudemon Jobannes to testify publicly, that he died in the same Faith, which he always professed, and maintained with his Pen (c). It appears, that, on the Day of his Funeral, he was looked upon as a Saint [B]. It is certain, that no Jesuit did more Honour to his Order, than He, and that no Author maintained the Cause of the Church of Rome, in general, and That of the Pope in particular, better than He. The Protestants knew it very well [C]; for most of their learned Divines wrote against

(a) A Town of Tuscany.

(b) To wit, Paul V.

(c) Taken from the Bibliotheca, comp. ad by Alegambus.

[A] He entertained Pope Gregory XV with the Compliment of the Centurion. Supposing, as he did, that the Pope is the Vicar of the Son of God, he did not see, in the Application of this Passage, all the Propriety, which others see in it; and, perhaps, he thought he said nothing but what was very pious. Alegambus relates This as a fine Circumstance of Bellarmin's last Hours. "Invictus eum decumbentem Gregorius XV Pontifex Max. ac bis per amantem amplexus sacrum se pro ejus valetudine facturum promisit. Ipse Christi Vicarium obsequiosissime reveritus usurpavit illud Centurionis, Domine, non sum dignus ut intres sub tellum meum (1). --- Pope Gregory XV visited him, as he lay sick, and, twice embracing him very lovingly, promised him, he would pray for his Health. Bellarmin, out of profound Respect to the Vicar of CHRIST, addressed him in the Words of the Centurion, Lord, I am not worthy, that thou shouldst come under my Roof." The Spanish Ambassador, who made use of the same Words of the Centurion to a Prince, whom he looked upon as an Heretic, cannot be so easily excused. Balzac, who alleges this Example to his Censor, blames it at the same time. "What would he have said of the Compliment of That Spanish Ambassador in England, who received a Visit of King James, with these Words of the Maf: Domine, non sum dignus ut intres sub tellum meum (2)?"

[B] It appears that, on the Day of his Funeral, he was looked upon as a Saint. The Swiss of the Pope's Guard were posted round the Coffin, to keep off the Crowd, who endeavoured to throw themselves on the Corps, to touch and kiss it. All that he had made use of, was taken away, and distributed to those, who desired to have Relics of Them for devout Purposes. "Adversus undam populi concurrentis antea oculum tactumque sacri pignoris adhibere oportuit Helvetios et stipatoribus Pontificis. --- Quicquid rerum in usu habuit raptum distrahiturque in postulantes est ad venerationem (3)." When Bellarmin resigned his Archbishopric of Capua, the whole City was greatly afflicted at it: Some kissed his Garment; others rubbed their Rejaries devoutly against it; and every one pressed for his Blessing (4). These are Preludes of Worship, which may, in time, be followed by a Canonization in Form. It is pretended, that he foretold some things, and wrought some Miracles (5); and, because, after his Death, the Odour of his Sanctity was rather increased than diminished, the Congregation of the Rites was ordered, a-new, in the Year 1674, to proceed to the necessary Informations concerning his Life, and Miracles, to the end, that, if there be occasion, he may be beatified (6).

[C] No Author maintained the Cause of the Church of Rome better than He. --- The Protestants knew it very well. "They grant, that he against him for the Space of forty or fifty Years. Their Professors, Lectures, and Theses, made his Name resound every where; Ut litus Hyla, Hyla omne sonaret (d). He was attacked on all Sides, and his Adversaries did not forget to examine, whether he had not contradicted, and afforded Weapons against, himself [D]. It is the Subject of a Book, which must needs have perplexed him not a little. There are some indiscreet and rash Men to be found every where; and therefore it is no wonder, if some Protestant Writers have published Falshoods against Bellarmin, of which his Party took Advantage [E]. There is no great Inconvenience in this, when unknown

Writers

"is the most subtle Enemy of the Truth, that has hitherto undertaken to oppose it: That Demetrius, the Silver-smith, spoken of in the nineteenth of the Acts of the Apostles, did not use so much Art in working his little Silver Shrines of Diana, as this cunning Artisan of Error did, in re-building the Palaces, and Altars, of Superstition: Which has given occasion to compare him to That Marcion, of whom Tertullian says, that, Dedecus sum ingenio obumbrat, qui cum causis ubique ferè pessimas tuncat, et impiorum dogmatum patrocinio verissimum se Satanae atque Antichristi satellitem præbeat, agit tamen ingenio, ut speciosis coloribus inducat omnia, & distinctionum prælligiis, & umbris, eludat ea quæ solidissimâ veritate constituta sunt (7). --- He has the Address to disguise the badness of his Cause; and, though he generally undertakes to defend the worst, and, by patronizing impious Tenets, shows himself a true Minister of Satan, and Antichrist, yet he has the Art of giving a specious Turn to every thing, and, by subtle Distinctions, of eluding what is built upon the strongest Reason." Be sure not to believe what Alegambus says, viz. That Beza owned, that Bellarmin had overthrown all the Protestant Authors. Nec ipsi hostes ausi sunt dissiteri, ex quibus Theodorus Beza, unus hic liber, æstbat, nos omnes hunc præturbat (8). It is a Jeit to alledge such things, without quoting the Book, where they are to be found. On such Occasions, the very Line, or, at least, the Page, ought to be quoted, otherwise every one will take such an Assertion for an ill-grounded Hear-say. I am fully persuaded, that Beza had not such a good Opinion of Bellarmin, and that, if he had, he would never have owned it. Alegambus says another thing, the Falshood whereof is not so obvious; which is, That a new Lecture was founded at Cambridge and Oxford, to confute Bellarmin. "In Angliæ Academiis Cantabrigiensi primum, mox etiam in Oxoniensi, nova prælectio instituta est, ad controver-nias Bellarmini, si possent, refellendas (9)." (7) Id. ibid.

(8) Alegamb. Bibl. Soc. Jesu. pag. 411.

[D] It has been examined, whether he has not contradicted himself. A Minister of Lithuania, whose Name was Andrew Crastocius, composed a Work entitled, Bellum Jesuiticum (10), in which he objects to the Jesuits Two hundred and five Contradictions. Sometimes Bellarmin does not agree with the other Jesuits, but most frequently Bellarmin confutes himself, in That Book.

I have said often (11), that He was reproached with having made use of, and opposed, the same Principles, according as he was to dispute either against the Protestants, or against the Enthusiasts. Here are some Particulars concerning that sort of Contradiction. "Some, being willing to excuse Bellarmin's Contradictions, and want of Memory, have said, that the great number of Persons, who had a Hand in the Fabrick of This Work, I mean, of his Writings, like the Builders of Babel, introduced this Confusion, for want of Understanding one another: But Those of his Communion are so far from taking this for an Excuse, that they reject it, as injurious to him: Fulgati, who wrote his Life, says, that he never employed an Amenfis. --- I believe, the true cause of Bellarmin's Contradictions, is, that the present necessity of attacking, or defending, is a more powerful Object, than any other; he cared but little, whether he was consistent with himself, or not, provided none should believe, that he agreed with his Adversaries (12). --- Bellarmin has often verified This Observation in his Books of Controversy: When he disputes against the Libertines and the Schwenfeldians, about the necessity of the Scripture, he speaks like a Protestant. And, when he disputes against the Protestants, on the same Subject, he argues like a Schwenfeldian. If he undertakes to confute the Pelagians about the Perfection of Works, he makes use of all the Arguments of those, whom he calls Calvinists: If he has to do with the Calvinists, he makes use of the Reasons and Distinctions of the Pelagians. If he writes against the Anabaptists concerning the Baptism of Children, he proves it by the Scripture: If he disputes with Us about Tradition, the Baptism of Children is one of the Points, which seems to him to prove the necessity of it, and of which the Scripture does not speak after a convincing manner, as he says. This puts me in mind of the Comparison, which I have seen somewhere, of Bellarmin with a certain African, whose Name was Leo, whom he himself compares to That Ambitious Bird of Æthiops, who was sometimes a Bird, and sometimes a Fish; a Bird, when the King of Fishes exacted a Tribute; and a Fish, when the King of Birds exacted it. Ut Leo quidam Africanus in Granatenſi Regno natus, & postquam subjugatum est illud Regnum, in Africanam profugus, de se fateatur, si Afros vitio aliquo notari sentio, me Granatensium natum proficere; si Granatenſes malè audiant, mox Afer sum; Bellarminus certe multò quàm ille elegantius aviculam illam imitatur, qui nimirum respondet, Tom. I. Controv. l. i. c. 7. Patres secutos esse septuaginta Interpretum Editionem; Idem. Tom. I. Controv. l. i. c. 20. de 3. Eldrae agens, ait Patres secutos esse Hebræos, & tamen illud alterum, notate, quanta vi verborum efferat. Negari (inquit) non potest. Ipse tamen id ipsum loco posteriori negat (13). --- Thus

One Leo Africanus, born in the Kingdom of Granada, but who, upon the Reduction of That Kingdom, fled into Africa, confesses of himself; If I hear the Africans charged with any particular Vice, I profess myself a Native of Granada; if the People of Granada are reproached, presently I am an African. Bellarmin certainly imitates That Bird with more Elegance, than He: when he replies, and with what that Jesuit says, Jesuit says, that Bellarmin followed the Edition of the Septuagint; whereas, Tom. I. Controv. l. i. c. 20. treating of the third Chapter of Eldras, he says, the Fathers followed the Hebrew: and yet observe how strongly he asserts the former; It cannot be denied, says he: yet he himself denies it in the latter Place." [E] The Protestant Writers published Falshoods against Bellarmin, of which his Party took Advantage. The Jesuit John Argentus makes mention, in the Apology of his Order, of four Libels newly come out against the Society, the third of which is levelled directly against Bellarmin, and relates many things, which had caused, attended, or followed, his Death. Nevertheless, This Cardinal was yet living. Doubtless, Theophilus Raynaud meant This Libel, when he said, that, Twenty five Years before (14), a Book was published in Germany, wherein Bellarmin was accused of having killed many Children, to hide his Incontinence (15). It was said, moreover, that the Cardinal, being at last moved to Repentance, had gone to our Lady of Loretto, to see whether he could expiate his Crimes; but that the Priest, to whom he had confessed them, was seized with so much Horror, that he commanded him to be gone; which threw Bellarmin into a Despair, of which he died soon after. This is the Substance of That Libel. Bellarmin read it, and laughed at it. Doubtless, he made many Reflexions on a Book, which asserted his Death. Theophilus Raynaud thought, that Father Gresfor had given himself a needless Trouble in refuting these kind of Stories, and that they did great Prejudice to the Protestants (16); for one might learn from thence what Judgment was to be made of the pretended Letter of St Udalric, which says, that Six thousand Children's Heads were found in the Wells of Pope Gregory II, after

(14) This Calculation does not agree with the Year 1650, the Date of Th. Raynaud's Book, and with what that Jesuit says, that Bellarmin lived at That Libel.

(15) Th. Raynaud's Hoplheca, §. 2, Serie 2, cap. 1, p. 166, 167.

(16) It appears from the Bibliotheca of Alegambus, that Gretzer published Vindictio illustrissimi Cardinalis Bellarmini a criminatibus & infamibus Lutherani Magistri Ernesti Z-phirii, Ingolstadt, 1611, in 4to, and Castigatio libelli famosi adversus illustre Cardinalem Bellarminum, translated into High Dutch, by Father Conrad Vetter, 1615.

Writers commit this Fault; but, when Professors of Reputation impute to This Cardinal what he never taught, they injure their Cause, and expose themselves to great Mortifications. A Professor of Sedan, who has been very much talked of in Holland, is guilty of this Fault. It is remarkable, that Bellarmin did not follow the Doctrine after he had driven away the Priests Wives. "Hæreticis, vel ad unam horam vagum mendacium, in lucro ponitur. Revera tamen ex hoc mendacio decessit illis haud exiguum. Siquidem inde deprehensum est, quæ fide ex horum mendaciloquorum majoribus quispiam, ex commentis S. Udalrici Epistolæ, sex millia capitum infantium, intra puteum Gregorii secundi, cum uxores sacerdotibus abstulisset, reperta dixerit. Non est enim ovum ovo similis, quàm hoc de Bellarmini infantis ticius scriptum, & illa S. Udalrici Epistolæ de cædibus per Clericos & Sacerdotes scortatorum, adversus quam subditiis S. Antistitis Epistolam, & ipse Bellarminus l. de Cleric. cap. 22. & Baronius anno 591. alique certarunt." It is no ways necessary, that the Falsities, published against Bellarmin, should have a retroactive Effect on the Story of the Six thousand Childrens Heads; but it is certain, that no better Service can be done to the Jesuits, and in general to any Party, which one undertakes to defame, than to publish Calumnies, which may easily be confuted. It is worthy of Observation, that, among so many Persons, possessed with an unconquerable Itch of publishing Satires, so few have the Art of poisoning them as they ought. Most of Those, who attempt it, are ignorant, that, in order to succeed well in it, that is, to direct the Blow right, a Man must religiously observe these two things: One is, to advance nothing but what may be proved; and, above all, to abstain from Accusations, which may easily be confuted: The other is, not to maintain obstinately what has been once confuted. I had forgot a third Advice, which is, carefully to dissemble one's Passion, and to hide the Appearances of it. I own, that a Man, who acts quite contrary to these Rules, finds but too many Persons, in his Party, who greedily swallow down all that he says; but it is This very thing, which does a great Prejudice to their Cause; because the other Party grows angry, and looks upon their Adversaries, from whom so many Satires, so greedily swallowed, proceed, as Men destitute of Reason, Equity, and the Assistance of Grace. These are not Reflexions at random, but grounded upon Experience. See how Father le Tellier takes advantage of some Stories, which are spread abroad without knowing whether they be true or false. Read what follows:

"For Example; What will it avail the Jesuits of China to have been the first, and almost the only Persons, who submitted, and without the least Resistance, to the Apostolical Vicars, as soon as they appeared there in 1684; since, notwithstanding this, their Enemies published again, the last Summer, by the Pen of their Secretary, the Gazetteer of Holland, that the Holy Father was extremely angry with the Jesuits, because they would not acknowledge the Bishops, whom he sent to China? Can it be questioned, but that, some Years hence, This Lye will appear again in it's turn on the Stage? Likewise, what will it avail the Jesuits of Germany to have an Attestation, signed by four of the Elector Palatin's chief Counsellors, all Protestants, wherein they testify, that the History of the Jesuit, counterfeiting a Voice from Heaven, to deceive That Prince, and to animate him to the Destruction of Heresy, is a meer Fable? Will this Attestation hinder some good Protestants, who shall continue the Jesuitical History, from making, some time or other, a Chapter about This chimerical Adventure, on the Credit of the Gazetteer of Holland (17)?"

Is it not strange, that the Author of the Religion of the Jesuits had rather follow his blind Passion, than make a good use of this Passage of Father le Tellier? So far from it, that he brought the Apparition of the Palatine's chief Counsellors (18). I have it from very good Hands, that he blamed the Minister a Refugee, who inserted This Attestation in his Abridged History of Europe (19). Such Persons spoil the Trade, they take in hand. They should leave Satire to moderate Writers, who would compose them in a more dexterous and persuasive Manner.

[F] A Professor of Sedan — is guilty of this Fault. He maintained some Theſes, in the Year 1674. concerning the Power of the Keys, and charged Cardinal Bellarmin with having said, "That a contrite Man, full of Faith, and desirous to be reconciled with God, perishes eternally, except he can get a Priest to reconcile him before Death. WHICH I NEVER READ, added he, WITHOUT ASTONISHMENT AND INDIGNATION (20)." This implies, that he had often read these words in Bellarmin's; and yet they are not to be found in That Author. The Guardian of the Irisb Capuchins (21) disputed against these Theſes, and complained, at first, very vehemently of the wrong, which was done to Bellarmin. He continued the Dispute with the same violence, and confounded the Professor. This was not all. When the Dispute was ended, the King's Attorney presented his Petition against the said Professor (22); the Consequence of which was, that the Author of the Theſes made his Recantation in Writing, which was signed by him, and three other Ministers.

No one has any reason to think it strange, that such an Accident should be mentioned in a Dictionary of this Kind; for it would avail nothing, for the future, to be silent about it. And, though I should have the Discretion not to say any thing of it, it would not be less known in Holland, where the Journal of the Learned is in every Body's Hand. Four Years ago, every one might have read, there, the Substance of what I have just now related; and besides, that the Authentic Proofs of Mr Jurieu's Recantation, (for it was he, who composed, and maintained, these Theſes) are three Certificates produced by the Abbot de Cordemoi; one was made by the King's Attorney at Sedan, the other by the Count de la Bourlie, Governor of the same City, and the last by Father Nicolas d' Hibernie, A Capuchin (23). I have read these three Certificates, in the Book of the Abbot de Cordemoi; they are dated in the Year 1689. It may easily be imagined, that this Disgrace afflicted those of the Protestant Religion, and pleased the Roman Catholics.

It is against my Will, that I am forced to make an Addition to this Remark, in This Edition; but, Mr Jurieu having published something very outrageous against me on this Subject, it will be proper to produce, here, both his Words, and my Reply. "The great blank, which remains in the last Pages of this Sheet, is a Temptation to me, which I cannot resist, to allege a notable Example of the Trifles, and the Malignity, which This Book is said to be full of. The Case is this: Mr Jurieu, in a public and printed Dispute, quoted a Passage out of Bellarmin, wherein through the Slip of the Author's Pen, or the Printer's Mistake, instead of attritus, there was contritus; which made Bellarmin say, That a Man, weeping, penitent, and contrite, was damned, if he did not receive the Sacramental Absolution: Whereas Bellarmin said, that a Man, grievously bemoaning his Sins, through a Sense of Attrition, was damned, if he did not receive the Priest's Absolution. This moved a Monk to make a great Clamour. Mr Jurieu, in a Time of Persecution, granted him, what he would have granted him any where else, even in a Country, where the Protestant Religion had been the prevailing Religion: that is, He acknowledged, that there was a Fault in the printed Copy, proceeding either from the Author's Hand, or from the Printer, and that Bellarmin's Opinion was such as the Monk said. Any sincere Person would have owned as much in Amsterdam, or London. Is this a Story, which, after having been printed in several Satires, deserved to pass, through a third and fourth Impression, into a Book, which was designed for Immortality? Can any thing be more mean, or pitiful? There is therefore both Malice, and Meanness, in it (24)." These are Mr Jurieu's Words; and, in the following manner, I consulted them. "I Doctrine of the Jesuits, concerning Predestination [G]; and that he did not favour loose Principles of Morality, nor the Expressions, which Indiscreet Zealots had insensibly introduced into the Litanies [H]. The Complaisance, which he had for his Superiors,

"find, that Bellarmin's Business sticks in his Stomach: I do not wonder at it; but Prudence should not have suffered him to make an Addition of it at the end of his Work. Silence had been best. The less certain things are stirred, the less they are troublesome. What I have said of That Affair is no Example of Trifling and Malignity. Without it, I should have ill performed the Duty of an Historian; since the Original Design of my Work was to observe the false Accusations, to which the Persons, of whom I was to speak, may have been exposed. If I had omitted This in the Article of Bellarmin, might it not have been justly said, that I was Partial, and that I omitted Things, which I could not pretend to be ignorant of? I borrowed it, not from a Satirical Book, as he falsely says; but from a Book of Controversy, and from the Journal of the Learned. I do not examine the Turn, which he takes, to cover his Fault; I only desire my Readers to have recourse to my Dictionary, in order to compare the Pieces, which are produced there, with his Reflexions. By this Comparison it will appear, how much Nature suffers in him, when he is obliged to perform some Act of Humility, and Sincerity. I am not surprized at it; for, when a Bow has been always bent one way, it is very difficult to bend it the contrary way, at the first undertaking. It is the same thing with the Fibres of our Brains (25)."

(25) Reflexions on a Pamphlet, entitled, Judgment of the Public, &c. pag. 15.

Most of my Friends thought, that I had too much neglected to make use of my Advantages: Opportunities, say They, have not failed you, but you have been wanting to Them; and a Man ought to avoid this Reproach, in a Paper War, no less, than in a true War. Why did you not fully expose This Author's Subterfuges? Could you not have confounded him by such and such Reflexions? I excused myself with the most proper means to put an end to this Discourse; which was by saying, that such Observations should not be squandered away in a loose Sheet; and that it was better to relieve them for another Edition of my Dictionary. I have considered the matter, since, more than once, and have found, that the best way is to leave my Readers to reflect on this little Incident. It will not be difficult for them to compare all the Pieces of This Process together, nor to discover, in Mr Jurieu's Apology, the grimaces, and contortions, of a Man, who suffers the rack. After all, it belongs to the Abbot de Cordemoi to refute This Apology. It is my Business, rather to be the Historian, than the Author, of the Reflexions, which This Quarrel may afford.

[G] Bellarmin did not follow the Doctrine of the Jesuits concerning Predestination. He was a good Thomist, and no ways a Molinist. But, how great soever his Authority was among his Brethren, he had but few Imitators. The small number of Anti-Molinists, in That great Body, was, nevertheless, of some use. I cannot better explain this Thought, than by setting down the words of the Author of the History of the Congregation of Auxiliis. "We sometimes meet with Men of an extraordinary Genius, who have acquired Credit, and have made themselves necessary to their Society; and who, raising themselves above the Fears and Considerations, to which others think themselves obliged to yield, teach the Truths, which they have learned from good Studies, more freely, not being able to resolve to betray their Consciences, or to act against their Knowledge. The Society bears with them, and suffers this little Revolt, because they know how to make it serviceable to their Party, and turn it to their Advantage and Glory; besides they know, there is no danger, that such an example should be followed by a great number, and cause a Schism in the Schools of the Society. Nay it is for their Grandeur, and agreeable to their Principles, to have grave Doctors of all Opinions, as it may promote their Capital Doctrine of Probability. No one knows what may happen. Things may take a quite contrary Turn; and, if the Society should find themselves obliged, (at least in some Provinces) to change their Opinion about Grace, as they did

"in France about the Pope's Authority, it would not be consistent with their Dignity to look for grave Doctors elsewhere, on whose Authority they might ground their Change. Among the Divines, of whom I speak, we may reckon Father Tiphaine, so famous for his two Works, De Hypothesi, and De Ordine, and the Author of the Tricis, which was maintained at Rome in 1674, whose Opinions concerning Predestination, and Grace, are altogether agreeable to Those of St Augustin (26). I have set down this Passage at length, not only because it may be inferred from it, that Bellarmin was very much considered in his Order, and that he knew it well, but also by reason of a certain Salt, with which these words are sprinkled, which is very proper to excite many Notions.

(26) At the History of the Congregation of the Holy Spirit, p. 31.

[H] He did not favour loose Principles of Morality, or the Expressions of Indiscreet Zealots — in the Litanies. The Patrons of This Morality did not approve of the Delay of Abolition; but Cardinal Bellarmin "preached, before some Popes, the necessity, and usefulness, of this Delay; and his Sermons are so full of this Doctrine, that it plainly appears, he laid it much to heart, and put it in practice very carefully. One may see some very fine Passages, extracted out of them by Cardinal d'Aguirre, in his eighth and tenth Dissertations on the third Council of Toledo (27). He, who supplies me with these words, is a Janseuist, who published a Memorial, containing, I. A Summary Deduction of the Origin and present State of the Doctrinal Disputes in the Netherlands, and of the true means to put an end to them: II. A succinct Answer to the three Accusations of Janseuism, Rigorism, and Novelty (28). He says, that the "Learned and Pious Cardinal Bellarmin might have passed for an Innovator, as well as for a Rigorist, if he had done, in these times, what he did on divers occasions for the Reestablishment of Discipline, and for the Reformation of Abuses. The Alterations he made in his Archdiocese of Capua; the Order, which he settled in the Bishopric of Monte-Pulciano, which he governed some Years, in the Absence of the right Bishop; the Advice, which he gave Pope Clement VIII. for the Reformation of the Church; That, which he addressed to his own Nephew, Bishop of Treviso, for his Conduct, and for the Administration of his Diocese; the Sermons, which he preached in the Apostolic Palace, and in the two Churches, I have already named, are so many witnesses of the holy, and necessary, Novelties, which he endeavoured to introduce, and of which he made the Obligation known. — Every one knows, that it is chiefly upon This (29) that the Accusation of Novelty was first formed. But, if it be an Innovation, Cardinal Bellarmin cannot be cleared. For he made such Alterations in the Litanies of the Holy Virgin, as would, now-a-days, make Those exclaim greatly, who are so lavish in bestowing the Epithet of Innovator, and That of Enemy to the Worship of the Holy Virgin, that nothing is more common, in their Writings, than these kind of Accusations against the most Catholic Persons, and Those, who are most truly devoted to the Worship of The Mother of God. But this most Pious and Learned Cardinal cannot be accused of Novelty in This, without accusing Pope Paul V of it, by whose Order he made those Alterations. He gives an account of it in a Preface, wherein he says, That he has retrenched several Verses of the Litanies of our Lady of Loretto, because they were too metaphorical, such as these, TURRIS Eburnea, hortus conclusus, and the like; and that he had omitted others, because, though they may admit of a good Sense, they are susceptible of an harsh one, from whence the Enemies of the Church take occasion to blaspheme, such as these are: MARIA, DEI ET HOMINUM MEDIATRIX, INTERCEDE PRO NOBIS; AD OMNI RECCATO LIBERA NOS DOMINA; and others of that nature. For such kind of Innovations seem to attribute to the Holy Virgin what is proper to JESUS CHRIST as God."

perious, in suffering some things to be altered in his Writings, and altering some Passages himself, concerning the Efficacy of Grace, does not hinder him from being, in the main, an Augustinian Doctor [I]. He brought himself into Trouble, almost for the same Reasons, which so much embroiled the Abbot de la Trappe with the Monks [K].

[I] What was altered in his Writings — concerning the Efficacy of Grace, does not hinder him from being an Augustinian Doctor. Let us illustrate this by a Passage taken out of a Jansenist Book. "There is reason to believe, that the Doctrine of This Cardinal, on This Point, was, originally, very agreeable to St Augustin's Notions, when he sent his Controversies to be printed in Germany, and that it was one of the Opinions, which his Brethren of That Country took the Liberty to alter, in hopes, says the Author of his Life, to do more good among Heretics. I do not fear making a rash Judgment, in attributing this Alteration to Father Gregory of Valentia, That famous Martyr of the Molinian Grace. He was at Ingolstadt, whilst they printed Bellarmin's Controversies there; and he caused some Theses to be maintained there, in the Year 1584, which are, perhaps, the first of the Society, in which this new Invention of the Scientia Media appeared, which he thinks to be necessary in order to defend Human Liberty against the new Heretics. I will not deny what is said of the Heroic Patience of Father Bellarmin, for which the Author of his Life commends him on This Occasion: yet it appears, by the Revision he made of his Work, in 1608, that he found it had been too much softened, or rather too much corrupted, in relation to the Efficacy of Grace. And This Author of his Life, after having praised his Modesty, and his Humility, in suffering the Alterations of some of his Opinions, testifies, that, on the other side, he firmly stood to Those, which he believed to be either of Faith, or very much authorized in the Church: It cannot be conceived, says he, how inflexible he appeared on such Occasions, as was plainly seen by what happened in relation to what he had taught, in his Books, concerning Predetermination, the Assistance of Divine Grace, &c. That is, They could never make him change his Opinion in relation to Free-Predetermination, which makes, as he says, Part of the Faith of the Church; nor concerning Grace, which he believes to be efficacious, not merely by the Event, nor because it pleases the Will to consent to it; but by itself, and of it's own Nature: Which he positively says to be agreeable to St Augustin's Doctrine, and also to the Holy Scriptures. This he had always at Heart: And the Congregation of Auxiliis, which was just broke up, and where he had heard the Dominicans maintain the true Influence of Grace, of itself, with so much Solidity, caused, without doubt, some Remorse of Conscience in him, for having had a Patience, so prejudicial to Truth, in permitting his Sentiments to be altered upon This Subject; or in having altered them himself, by virtue of the Promise, which he had made, when he was admitted among the Jesuits, to following the Opinions of the Society, as it's Constitutions obliged him to do. That which is certain, is, That he corrected, not all that was to be corrected, the Society being too far engaged to abandon him, but some Passages, in which it did not appear, that he acknowledged any other manner of Operation in Grace, than That, which is called Objective, and Moral: he will have it known on the contrary, that he admits of an effective, and physical, Operation: Voluntatem moveri per gratiam etiam efficienter & physice; Deum aspirare voluntati bonum desiderium, afflare initium bonæ voluntatis: quæ aspiratio five afflatio physica actio est & Deo propria &c. — That The Will is influenced, likewise, Effectively and Physically, by Grace; That God inspires the Will with good Desires, or inspires the first Motions of good Inclinations; which Inspiration is a Physical Operation, and proper to God. This he repeats several times: For fear, says he, that any one should imagine, that we only admit of a Moral Influence on the Will by Grace." The Jansenist Author, having quoted some other Passages of The same Work of Bellarmin, concludes thus: "By all this it appears sufficiently what we should have found in

"Bellarmin, if his Work had not been altered by other Hands; and what That blind Obedience can do, which the Jesuits promise to yield to the Society, when they are received into it; even in relation to the Doctrine of the Church. But it appears also, that the first and last Opinions of Bellarmin were for the Doctrine of Grace, efficacious by itself, and that the Engagement, which he was under to the Society, not having permitted him to expunge all that had been inserted in his Works without his Knowledge, nor to alter the Foundation of the Opinions, which they had fastened upon him, yet he could not forbear giving Testimony to the Truth before his Death, knowing well, that he had said enough to overthrow all that remained in his Works, contrary to St Augustin (30)." Let us observe, that Robert Abbot strongly attacked Bellarmin in relation to the Alterations in the new Editions of his Works (31).

[K] He brought himself into Trouble, almost for the same Reasons, which so much embroiled the Abbot de la Trappe with the Monks. Bellarmin wrote a Book de Gemitu Columbæ, wherein he says, That one of the Things, which ought to make pious Souls lament and groan, is the great Remissness, into which some Religious Orders are fallen. Bitter Complaints have been made of This, as of a biting Invektive (32). But the Cardinal has not wanted Apologists, who have maintained, that what he complained of, is but too true; and that the want of Reformation is so visible in divers Places, that They, who live in this Disorder, and do not perceive it, verify the Maxim, Sensibile juxta ac multo magis intra sensum positum non facit sensationem (33). Let us quote a Passage of Theophilus Raynaud: "Audivit Bellarmin nus asper & mordax, quia in libro de Gemitu Columbæ fontem unum lacrymarum proposuit, Religiosorum aliorum Ordinum laxationem, quam homo ille spiritu barytono usquam cerni inficiatur, & utinam vel in speciem verè inficietur. Sed tanti fuit, Bellarminum mordere quoquo modo. Nam esse aliquas Religiones laxatas, & quibus reformatio sit necessaria, res est adeo nota, ut nemo nisi cæcus non videat, ait Major in. 4. d. 38. q. 2. Sed non est novum aliquis ita cæcitere, præsertim in causa propria, ut notum est ex eo exemplo quod recitat Nider lib. 2. de Reform. Relig. cap. 9. Episcopi ex ordine collapsi assumpti, qui, audiente ipso Nidero, pertinacissime inficiatus est, suum Ordinem esse collapsum, & reformatione egere, quantumvis (inquit Nider), luce foret clarius toti mundo, contrarium esse verum (34). — — — Bellarmin was taxed with Calumny and Invektive, because, in his Book de Gemitu Columbæ, he makes one Source of Tears to be the Decay of Discipline in some Orders; the truth of which This Author (He, who complained of Bellarmin) absolutely denies; and I wish he could with reason deny it, even as to Appearances. But it was worth while to attack Bellarmin at any rate. For, that some Religious Orders have relaxed Discipline, and stand in need of Reformation, is so notorious, that no one, that is not blind, but sees it, as Major says, in 4. d. 38. q. 23. But it is no uncommon Thing for People to be thus blind, especially when the Case is their own; as appears from the Instance, alledged by Nider, lib. 2. de Reform. Relig. c. 9. of a Bishop, taken from a fallen Order, who, in the bearing of Nider himself, obstinately denied, that his Order was fallen, and stood in need of Reformation, when (says Nider) it was as clear as the Noon-Day, that the contrary was true." The Pseudonymous Philadelphus de novo lacu, who wrote a Treatise de modernis Jesuitarum moribus, tells us, that it is questioned, whether Bellarmin be the true Author of the Gemitus Columbæ (35). This doubt seems to me very unreasonable; for This Treatise came out whilst That Cardinal was living, and was inserted in the Collection of his Works. Observe, that the Dominican Gravina, is one of Those who wrote against this Gemitus. See the Remark [B] of the Article KELLER.

because seven new Treatises were added to the first Volume, whereof the last is the Revision, and Correction, which the Author made, of all his Works [N]. It is thus, that the Writers of the Bibliothèque of the Jesuits have explained themselves; but This is not exact [O]. Besides this Body of Controversies, he composed many other Books, which amount to three Volumes in Folio, in the Edition of Cologne, 1617 (e). Some of his Sermons, and many of his Letters, have been published since his Death (f). His Life has been written by four, or five, Authors [P]; the last, if I am not mistaken, is Daniel Bartoli. The rash Judgment, Scaliger passed on Bellarmin, cannot be sufficiently condemned [Q].

Though this Jesuit had eagerly maintained the Pope's Power over the Temporalities of Kings, yet he displeased Sixtus V., and had the Mortification to see his Work inserted in the Index of the Inquisition [R]. What he wrote on the same Sub-

"validæ sint, responsiones autem nimis debiles (47). — It is reported, with what Truth I cannot say, that the Controversial Works of Bellarmine are not permitted to be publicly sold in Italy, because his Objections are too strong, and his Answers too weak."

[N] The Revision, and Correction, which the Author made, of all his Works. I have read a curious Particular in Mr Chevallier, which I shall relate here with great Pleasure. "This Cardinal, seeing, that his Controversies were printing in divers Places, and that many Faults were left in them, thought he ought to endeavour to remedy this Evil. He made such an exact Copy of his Book, and corrected it so well, that there remained not one Error in the Manuscript; and he gave it to a Bookfeller of Venice, to have a most exact Impression of it. But it happened quite contrary to his Hopes. The Printer neglected this Edition so much, that it proved the most faulty of all. This famous Author, being vexed at it, took Pen in Hand to acquaint the Public with it, after having seen, that That Impression, being accounted an Original one, had carried the Evil into a second, and had also much infected the fair Edition of Ingolstadt, to which it served for a Model. He published his Book, entitled, Recognitio Librorum omnium Roberti Bellarmini, wherein he inserted a Corractorum, which shews all the Faults of That Edition of Venice, and was printed in octavo, at Ingolstadt, in the Year 1698. He complains, in the Preface, pag. 125, that, in above forty Places, the Printer makes him give a Negative, for an Affirmative, Answer, and an Affirmative for a Negative. And the Errata, which he made, fills Eighty eight Pages. Et quod gravissimum est (animadverti) supra quadraginta locos ita esse corruptos, additis vel detractis negativis particulis, vel alio modo immutatis, ut contra verum omnino sensum contineant, quod certe summo me dolore affecit — tamen quoniam animadverti non paucos errores editionis vix Venetæ in Editionem secundam Venetam, & in Ingolstadensem ex Venetâ expressam, transiisse, idcirco in Corractorum notavi Libros, Capitula, Paragraphos, Columnas, Literas, & Versus (48)." Note, that This Corractorum was, at first, printed at Rome, in the Year 1607, and that, in the Year 1596, the Author, causing his controversial Works, revised, and enlarged, to be printed at Ingolstadt, had acquainted the World, that he did not acknowledge the preceding Editions for his. Not that they contained any Opinions, which ought to be disapproved, but on account of the Faults of the Impression, as he told Possessin, in the Year 1598 (49).

[O] What the Writers of the Bibliothèques of the Jesuits have said of the Correction of his Works, is not exact. I find, in a Work, printed in the Year 1608 (50), that, before That Year, Bellarmin's Controversies had appeared, in four Volumes. The first Edition in three Volumes, in Folio, is of Ingolstadt, 1586. The following Year, they were reprinted again, at the same Place, in Octavo. A new Edition was made of them in the same City, in 1588, and another in the Year 1590. The first Edition, in four Volumes, is of Venice, apud Minimam Societatem. An Appendix of several particular Treatises was added to it (51). It must be said, then, that Alegambus, and his Continuator, are not exact, since they give us That of Cologne, 1615, for the first Edition, in four Volumes. They say also, that the first Edition of the first Tome came out in the Year 1581, That of the second in the Year 1583, and That of the third in the Year 1592. This is contrary to Possessin's Relation, and wants Exactness on another Account; for They should have named the Place, where these pretended first Editions were made.

[P] His Life has been written by four or five Authors. Mr Tessier reckons up nine of them, and ranges them in this manner; 1. Daniel Bartoli; 2. Didacus Ramirez; 3. Jacobus Fulgatus; 4. Georgius Robertus Jonus; 5. Johannes Morinus; 6. Marcellinus Cervinus; 7. Petrus Morinus; 8. Sylvester Petra Sancta; 9. Tarquinius Gallucius (52). But we must reduce the Number; James Fulgatti, John Morin (53), Peter Morin (54), and Sylvester Petra Sancta, ought to pass only for one Historian of Bellarmin; for the three last have only translated the Italian Work of Fulgatti; and, if Petra Sancta, who translated it into Latin, made some Additions to it, he ought not, therefore, to be considered as one of the Historians. If George Robertus Jonus wrote This Cardinal's Life, ought he not to appear, in his Place, in the Body of Mr Tessier's Book? But he no where appears there. We meet with only one Georgius Robertus Jonus there, who was Author of the Life of Robert Rolland, a Scotch Divine. Note, that Tarquinius Gallucius did not compose Bellarmin's History, but only his Funeral Oration. Mr Mayer gave a more exact List (55); he quotes the Life of Bellarmin, written by James Fulgatti, and printed at Rome, in the Year 1624, in 4to; Daniel Bartoli de vita Bellarmini, at Rome 1618 (56), in 4to; Marcellinus Cervinus de vita & moribus Bellarmini, at Sienna 1622, in 8vo; Didacus Ramirez in vita Bellarmini ex cæteris auctoribus Hispanicis; & Nicolas Antonio in Bibliotheca Hispanica memorata; And the Account de pio obitu Bellarmini ex literis Eudæmoni-Johannis, printed at Dillingen, in the Year 1621. He quotes also Gallutius, Alegambus, Sebastiani Badii accura Roberti Cardinalis Bellarmini (57); the Elogies of Eusebius Sarrini, a Florentin Abbot of the Order of Cîteaux; Ughelli, in the Four hundred fifth Page of the sixth Volume of the Italia Sacra; Imperialis; Andrew du Souffai; & Nicolas Erythraeus. He forgot Edward Coffin, an English Jesuit, who wrote a Book de morte Cardinalis Bellarmini, printed at St Omer, in the Year 1623, in 8vo: he disguised himself under these two Letters C. E. (58). Note, that Didacus Ramirez was a Spanish Jesuit, who died the eighth of April 1647 (59).

[Q] The rash Judgment Scaliger passed on Bellarmin cannot be sufficiently condemned. Let him say, as much as he pleases (60), that if any One would give him a Bellarmin, he would not accept of it, and that he would take care not to lose his Time in reading such an Author, who writes ill, quod male scripsit non legam, nec male bonas bonas colloca. But he is inexcusable in saying, that Bellarmin did not believe any thing of what he printed, and that he was a meer Atheist (61). It is to usurp God's Right who is the only Judge of Thoughts, and he who searches the Reins and the Hearts. It is to set a bad Example, and to authorize the fury of those, who said, that Calvin, Beza, &c. preached against their Conscience, and had no Religion.

[R] He had the Mortification to see his Work de Pontifice Romano inserted in the Index of the Inquisition. From This Fact Mr Arnauld draws a good Argument ad hominem against those, who preach up the Authority of the Congregations of the Index. We find, says he (62), that Bellarmin's Work de Romano Pontifice "was proscribed by Sixtus V. because he "judged, as well as those, to whom he had given "it to be examined, that it had done great Prejudice "to the Pontifical Dignity, by saying, "that the "Power, which they pretended, that J. C. gave to "his

Among all the Roman Catholics, who have wrote against him, none has so fully discovered the weak Parts of his Works, as John de Launoi [T]. We shall mention two of Bellarmin's Thoughts, which shew, that he loved Peace, and that he was not pleased with the Ambition of the Cardinals [U]. The Protestants have taken notice of one thing, which he says, concerning the Merit of Works, viz. That Because of the Uncertainty

"his Vicar, on Earth, over the Temporalities of Kings, is not direct, but only indirect; and it was for this reason, that, these Books de Romano Pontifice, were inserted among the Prohibited. This is what these two Jesuits (63) give us to understand, somewhat obscurely, to induce us to believe, that this proceeded not so much from the Pope, as from Bellarmine's Enemies, who had persuaded him to it: Doctrina Bellarmini auctoritatem illam minui, quam Christus Dominus Vicario suo in terris dedit Ecclesiae dignitatem firmitatemque; idque fieri in opinione ipsius circa Dominium temporarium, quod Pontifici competit item in res temporarias. By which These Authors understand the Power, which it is believed, at Rome, the Pope has, to depose Kings; as appears by the following Page, where Bellarmine's Book against William Barclay on this Subject of deposing Kings is called: Treatatio de Potestate Pontificis in res temporarias, adversus Gulielmum Barclaium. So that it was not for want of having understood Bellarmine's Doctrine right on this Subject, that he received the Affront of having his Books put among the condemned Writers; but because That Pope was not satisfied with the indirect Power, which he gave him, over Kings, and would have a direct one. And this continued as long as That Pope lived. For these same Authors acknowledge, that it was not, till after his Death, that the Cardinals expunged them ex indice probrorum scriptorum. Pray, Sir, tell us, whether you think, that any Jesuit will own, that it would have been a mortal Sin to read Bellarmine's Books de Romano Pontifice, during the Life of Sixtus V, and that, if a Priest had done it, he would have deserved to be deprived, by a Sentence, of the Power of preaching, confessing, and directing Souls."

Consult the Dissertation of the famous Mr Mayer, de fide Bellarmini ipsius Pontificis ambigua, printed at Amsterdam 1697, and you will find, there (64), a long Passage of Fullgatti, and some others. Consult also the second Tome of the French Mercury; it will inform you "That, towards the end of the Year 1586, when the first Book of the Controversies of Bellarmine was brought into France, of the Impression of Ingelhardt, Stephen Michel, a Bookseller of Lyons, being at Paris, joined with another Bookseller in publishing That Book; which they began to do; and, notice thereof being given to the King's Attorney-General, he caused one and twenty Sheets, already finished to be seized, and forbade them to continue the printing of it: It was on account of the third Controversy, where he treated de Summo Pontifice, and where he attributed an indirect Power to the Pope over Emperors, Kings, and Sovereign Princes, and divers other things against the temporal Sovereignty of Kings (65)." One may therefore say of the medium, which Bellarmine observed, between the Ultramontain Canonists, and the Doctors of the Sorbonne, what Herennius Pontius declared in relation to the Conduct of his Son, who saved the Lives, but not the Honour, of the Roman Soldiers. Illa quidem sententia ea est, quae neque amicos parat, neque inimicos tollit, servare modo quos inimicis irritaveris (66). — It is an Opinion, which neither gains you Friends, nor loses you Enemies, barely to preserve Those, whom you exasperate against you by Ignominy. This Jesuit observed a mean which displeased the Court of Rome, without pleasing the Court of France. It is the common fate of moderate Opinions; they neither procure you Friends, nor appease your Enemies, and they leave you for a mark to the two Factions, which place themselves in the opposite Extremes.

[S] What he wrote on the same Subject against W. Barclay, was treated still worse in France.] I mean his Treatatus de potestate parvi Pontificis in Temporalibus adversus Gulielmum Barclaium, printed at Rome in the Year 1610. Mr Mixer observes, that King James wrote against This Treatise, and that the Senate of Venice, and the Parliament of Paris, condemned it. He gives us, in Latin, the Decree of That Parliament, and refers us to the Continuator of Thouzas (67). He says also, that This Work of Bellarmine wanted but little of being burnt at Paris by the Hands of the Common Executioner: "Faces jam accendebat carniſex, ut pœnas à scripto & scriptore ſumeret, niſi Reginae animus, & iteratis & non deſinētibus Jeſuitarum deprecationibus fractus, illas extinxisset (68). — The Executioner already began to light the Fire, to punish The Work and it's Author, had not the Disposition of the Queen, influenced by the repeated and incessant Intreaties of the Jesuits, extinguished it." See the second Tome of the French Mercury, and you will find, there (69), the Substance of the Remonstrance of Mr Servin, the King's First Advocate, and the Decree of the Parliament (70), in these Terms: "The Court forbids all Persons, of what Quality and Condition soever, on the Penalty of High-Treason, to receive, retain, communicate, print, cause to be printed, or to expose to sale the said Book. And enjoins those, who shall have any Copies of the said Book, or know any Persons, who have, to declare it speedily to the Ordinary Judges, that diligent search may be made after them, at the Request of the Substitutes of the said Attorney-General, and that the Guilty may be proceeded against, as is requisite (71)."

[T] No One has so fully discovered the weak Parts of his Works, as John de Launoi.] Mr Mayer will inform you fully of This, in his Book. See also the Remark [T] of the Article LAUNOI (JOHN).

[U] He loved Peace, and had not learnt the Ambition of the Cardinals.] Peter de St Romuald says, that the most excellent of all Bellarmine's Works, "treating of Controversies, was proscribed at Rome, and inserted in the Index of Infamous Books. — Which he bore, adds he, with the same Patience, as he suffered the Contradictions of a certain Cardinal, in the Conclave, saying to those, who wondered at it, that an Ounce of Peace was worth more than a Pound of Victory. Being also asked (perhaps on account of that Cardinal) how it happened, that there were so few Cardinals in the Catalogue of the Saints; it is, said he, because they aspire to be Most-Holy: A smart Answer for those, who know what these Words signify in Italy; perche vogliono esser Santissimi (72)." The meaning of which is, that the Desire of being made Pope hinders the Cardinals from acquiring Holiness, though That Desire be a longing after the Title of Most Holy Father. The Critical Miscellanies of Mr Ancillon inform me, that Mr Godeau, "who wrote Bellarmine's Elogy, says, that one of his usual Sayings was, that the Cardinals are not Holy, because they would be Most Holy, that is to say Popes, who are called Most Holy Fathers: An Opinion, which he had from his Uncle Marcellus II, who cried out, one Day, at Table, Non video quomodo qui locum hunc altissimum tenent salvari possint (73). I do not see how those that are seated in St Peter's Chair can be saved (74)." The Respect, which I have for the Memory of the late Mr Ancillon, a Man of much Piety and Learning, is not inconsistent with the Liberty I am going to take. I do not find an exact Connexion between the Cardinal's Thought, and That of the Pope. Bellarmine's Intention was, not to say, that a Pope can hardly be saved, but that the Desire of being made a Pope attaches the Cardinals in such a manner to earthly Things, and unjust Intrigues, that they can make no Progress in the Way of Holiness. But Pope Marcellus II had not this Thought; he only considered the Obstacles, which a Man, who is actually Pope, meets with in the way of Salvation. So that Bellarmine's Jest does not seem to me to be part of his Uncle's Inheritance. If it be objected against me, that a Pope stands in need of as many Intrigues to perform the Part, which he acts in the World, as a Cardinal to attain to the Pontificate; certainty of our own Righteousness, and for fear of Vain-Glory, the surest way is to put our whole Trust in the alone Goodness and Mercy of God (g). Neither have they forgot what he preached at Louvain, in 1571, on the Excellency of the Bible. They make use of it to confute all, that he has said since, in his Works, against the Perfection and Sufficiency of the Scripture (b). The Book, which supplies me with these Words, contains many solid and curious Remarks concerning Bellarmin. I find in it, that This Cardinal, might, perhaps, have been Pope, if he had not been a Jesuit [X]; for Henry IV. told the French Cardinals, who went to the Conclave, after the Death of Clement VIII, that he should be very glad if Bellarmin was made Pope (i). I have read also, that the same Jesuit acquired the Esteem of Henry IV, whilst he was at his Court, whither he was sent with Cardinal Henry Cajetan (k), and that it is certain, the best of his Works cate; I shall answer, that it is another Question, and that it is to exceed the Limits, which ought to be put to the Sense of the Words, which Bellarmin made use of. I go further, and maintain, that, though the same Cardinal had said, on some other Occasion; That Popes are so far from deserving to be canonized, that they can hardly keep themselves from Hell; it cannot be pretended, that the Italian Words, which you have seen before, are the Copy of his Uncle Pope Marcellus's Exclamation. That Exclamation puts me in mind of the Sally of a Frenchman, who heard somebody praise the Piety, and moral Severity, of Innocent XI, in the Year 1689. "The Catholic Church, said he, has no need of such a Pope; it were better for her to have a Sovereign Pontiff, who understands the Art of aggrandizing himself, and of taking hold of all Opportunities, according to the Politics of the most refined Courts. The Greatness, and Majesty, of the Catholic Church, require a Head, not endowed with the Virtues of a Priest, but with the Talents of a cunning Politician. They require a Head, who has the Courage to damn himself, for the Good and Increase of his Dominions; this is the way to perform the Office of a good Shepherd, who gives his Life for his Sheep; this is to devote one's self for the Republic, better than Codrus, and the Decii did (75). A scrupulous, and devout Pope, like good Adrian VI, is only fit to let the Temporals of the Church perish (76), which are so advantageous for the Maintenance of the Spirituals." Such was This Frenchman's Discourse.

[X] He might, perhaps, have been made Pope, if he had not been a Jesuit. He had more Votes, than any of the rest, in the first Scrutiny of the Conclave of Leo XI (77); nevertheless, they did not think of him, then, in earnest. It was in the following Conclave (78), that they looked upon him as a fit Man to be Pope, and that they endeavoured to procure him the Pontificate; but Cardinal Aldobrandini's Faction made this Design miscarry. Bellarmin's Virtue, and the too great Power of the Jesuits, were the two chief Considerations, which hindered him from succeeding Leo XI. "Aldobrandino — fuggiva. — Bellarmino come Gesuita scopolopolo, è che tal volta haveva improvato molte attioni di Clemente Zio, è di lui stesso (79). — Haveva Bellarmino grand' amici per esser egli di letteratura, è di bontà singolare, mà l'esser Gesuita, è di coscienza delicata, lo rendevano poco amabile, appreso molti, li quali mossero ogni pietra, per rovinarlo. — Fù rinnovata, è sparà per tutto la memoria del disgresso dato à Bellarmino da Sisto V, che gli fece prohibire l'opera sua de potestate Pope: furono discorse al vivo tutte le conseguenze, che potevano derivare dall' esaltatione di un Gesuita; è insomma s'adopronò in maniera, che s'acquistò affatto il tutto (80). — Aldobrandino — fled away. — Bellarmin, at a conscientious Jesuit, and who had often disapproved of many Actions of Clement, his Uncle, and of Clement himself. — Bellarmin had great Friends, on account of his Learning, and singular Goodness; but his being a Jesuit, and of a tender Conscience, rendered him disagreeable to many, who left no Stone unturned to ruin him. — The Memory of Bellarmin's Disgrace with Sixtus V, who prohibited his Book De Potestate Papæ, was revived, and spread every where: Every Consequence, which might hinder the Promotion of a Jesuit, was thoroughly discussed; and they employed their Interest in such a manner, that the whole Affair was dropped." Let us set down, here, a Passage of Mr Ancillon. "I have always heard say, that the Court of Rome

"will take care not to place a Jesuit in the Papal Chair, and that Europe ought not to desire it; because they would infallibly make themselves Masters of the Holy See; inasmuch that all the other Orders might look upon themselves as excluded from it for ever, and that by this means they would make their Power, which is already very great, almost infinite and boundless: If we believe those, who write on this Subject, it seems this Maxim is not new in the Court of Rome. They have distrustful the Jesuits a long time, and are on their guard against them, in this respect; and we read, in the Life of Bellarmin himself, that Clement VIII, speaking of That Cardinal, who had already made himself famous, said, Dignus, sed Jesuita est (81)." We have a Proof, here, of the rash Judgments, which are only grounded on first Appearances. If you do not examine things thoroughly, and if you consider only the first Impressions, which they make on the Mind, you will imagine, that, in order to obtain a Dignity, it is a very great Advantage to belong to a very powerful Body; but, if you take the pains to reflect, you will find almost an invincible Obstacle in This very Thing. Within these ten Years (82) we have seen two Examples of this. Nothing contributed so much to exclude the Cardinal of Furstenberg from the Archbishopric of Cologne, and the Cardinal of Bouillon from the Bishopric of Liege, as their being recommended, and protected, by the Court of France, whose Power was superior to That of other States. Refer to This what I have said in Remark [H], of the Article INNOCENT XI, and remember the Thought of Florus, ipsa sibi obstat magnitudo. I have already applied it, on a quite different Occasion (83). Note, That Mons. Godeau observes, "that Barcinus, having made some Overtures to Bellarmin of the Thought, that he, and some other Cardinals, had of making him Pope, he received the Proposal as an Injury, was downright angry at it, and resolutely answered, that, if the taking up of a Straw from the Ground could make him Pope, he would not stoop to take it up (84)." I wonder that Mr Ancillon has not spoken of the solemn Vow, which Bellarmin made, if the Papal Dignity, which he did not desire, should be conferred upon him. He engaged himself not to enrich his Relations. These are the Terms of his Vow: "Die 24 Septembris anno 1614. ser. 6, in domo Novitiorum S. Andreæ degens, & exercitiis spiritualibus vacans, matura præhabita de liberatione in sacrificio Missæ, cum sumptibus esset S. Dom. nostr. corpus, votum voti Domino in hæc verba: Ego Robertus, Cardinalis Bellarminus, è Societate Jesu religiosus professus, voce DEO omnipotentis in conspectu B. V. Mariæ, ac totius cœlestis curiæ, quod si forte, quod non cupio, & precor Deum, ut non accidat, ad Pontificatum assumptus fuero, neminem ex consanguineis vel affinis meis exaltabo ad Cardinalatum, vel temporalem Principatum, vel Ducatum, vel Comitatum, vel quæcunque alium titulum, neque eos citabo, sed solum adjuvabo, ut in statu suo civiliter commode vivere possint. Amen, Amen (85). — On the Twenty fourth of September, in the Year 1614, being in the House of the Novitiate, of St Andrew, and intent upon spiritual Exercises, after mature Deliberation in the Sacrifice of the Mass, and being about to receive the Body of our Lord; I made a Vow to God in the following Words: I Robert, Cardinal Bellarmin, a professed Religious of the Order of JESUS, vow to Almighty God, in the Sight of the blessed Virgin Mary, and the whole Heavenly Choir, that if, which I do not desire, and wish to God may never happen,

The Inscription, which was put under this Cardinal's Print, imports, that he had preserved his Virginity, and his Baptismal Innocency, and that he had never told a Lie (m). When he was dying, he bequeathed one half of his Soul to the Holy Virgin, and the other half to JESUS CHRIST (n). He was so patient, that he suffered Flies, and such small Insects, to be very troublesome to him (Z). (r) See, towards the end of Remark (r).

"happen, I should ever be elected Pope, I will never raise any of my Family or Kindred to the Purple, Temporal Principality, Duchy, Earldom, or any other Title; nor will I enrich, but only assist them to live comfortably in their Civil Capacity. Amen, Amen."

[Y] Ancillon advances two Facts concerning Bellarmine, which are not true. Every one knows, that Cardinal Cajetan, Legate of Sixtus V. in France, made it his chief Business to cause Henry IV to be excluded from the Crown. It was not at the Court of That Monarch, that Bellarmine, That Legate's Chaplain, acquired the King's Esteem; for he was not there; he was at Paris, among the Leaguers, and used his utmost Endeavours for the Interest of the Rebels. This is what the Ministers have not failed to object; Read this Passage of Drelincourt; "Whence comes it, that Those of the Protestant Religion were in the King's Camp, whilst Bellarmine, Panigraula, and such Persons, were at Paris, preaching up Sedition, and the Pope sent some Legates to authorize the League, and to throw Oil into a Fire, which he ought to have extinguished with his Tears, and his own Blood (86)?"

As for what concerns the Treatise of the Ecclesiastical Writers, it is a good Work in it's kind; but it is far from being Bellarmine's best Book. There are several Treatises in his Volumes of Controversies, which discover his Wit, Learning, and Capacity, more nobly. Twenty small Pieces, every one as good as That, de Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis, would not have raised him to the Degree of Honour, which he deserved for the Form alone, in which he clothed his Body of Controversies; for see, here, the Commendation which a Learned Englishman gave him, on this Subject: "Vir erat, haud inficior, admirandæ industriæ, doctrinæ, lectionis stupendæ, Bellarminus: qui ut primus, ita solus, immanem illam molem, & immanem chaos controversiarum, stupendam ingenii dexteri felicitate, artificio singulari, excoluit, in ordinem redegit confusum prius, accuratè diligentia, & multorum annorum studio, eleganter expolivit: præcipuit ille palmam secutus omnibus, & sibi desponsatam vel destinatam cuicunque laudem abstulit. Nam ab illo, qui tractant hodiè Controversias, ut ab Homero Poëtæ, sua omnia ferè mutantur (87). - - - Bellarmine was, I confess, a Man of surprising Industry, Learning, and Reading; the first, and only Person, who, with Abilities, and Diligence, happily polished, and reduced into Form, the immense Chaos of Controversies. In this he was surpassed all that came after him, who, in treating such Subjects, borrow almost every thing from him, as the Poets do from Homer." Considerable Faults have been observed (88), in the Treatise, which Calixtus, and Mr Ancillon, pretend to be the best of all This Jesuit's Writings. See Bosius, in the second Chapter of his Introductio in Notitiam Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, with Mr Crenius's Notes. Librum, says he (89), omnium, quos Bellarmine edidit, optimum vocat D. Calixtus, tractatu de conjugio Clericorum, sectione 202. If we may believe Father Labbe, the first Edition of This Book of Bellarmine is of the Year 1617 (90). Father Sirmond took great care of it, as the Author had desired him (91). Several other Editions were made of it, which the Printers spoiled extremely; but, at last, a very correct one was published at Paris, by Cramoisi, in the Year formed the Plan of a Work upon it (92), which some very good Judges take for the best he composed. I mean his Dissertatio de Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis; which was printed, at Paris, in two Volumes, in 8vo, in the Year 1660. The Authors of the Bibliothèque de Jesuits knew nothing of the first Edition of This Treatise of Bellarmine; one of them, viz. Alegambus, mentions none, and Sotuel mentions only That of Cologne 1622, in 8vo. A new one was made in the same City in the Year 1684, in 4to; and the Continuation, which André de Saussai published, in the Year 1665, was joined to it. Bellarmine's Omissions were very considerable, as appears by the Supplement of Father Oudin, which was mentioned in the News from the Republic of Letters, in the Month of April, 1686.

Remark a Mistake of Bosius. He says, there is no trusting to Bellarmine's Judgment about the Greek Language; and that This Ignorance, which appeared in his other Books, was most conspicuous in the Treatise of the Ecclesiastical Writers, as Casaubon observed. "Græcarum Litterarum profusus ἀμύμων" "fuisse sicut omnia illius scripta, sic eximie hic liber novissime ab eo profectus, Casaubono judice exercitat. 16. sect. 150. ostendit, ut probe judicium illius de Græcis scriptoribus satis tuto fidei non possit." Bosius had just before said, that the first Edition of This Work of Bellarmine is of the Year 1616 (93). How could he believe then, that Casaubon had spoken of it, in that manner, in a Book, which was printed in the Year 1614? But, after all, will you say it is true, that Casaubon spoke of This Work; for, in this Case, Bosius's Error will be very inconsiderable? I answer, there is a great probability, that he had This Treatise of Bellarmine in view. There is an Edition of Cologne 1613, set down in the Catalogue of Oxford: and I have seen one of Lyons, 1613, in 4to, Revised and Corrected by the Author. So that This Work was plainly enough hinted at, in That Passage of Casaubon, where it is said, that it was the last Book of Bellarmine, which appeared; we may, therefore, affirm, that Father Labbe is mistaken, in placing the first Edition of it in the Year 1617.

[Z] He suffered Flies - - - to be troublesome to him. This deserves to be set down in Fulgati's own Words. "Inter insignes Bellarmine virtutes, alii ponunt miram eum in perferendis vexationibus patientiam, quam Jacobus Fulgatus laudat sequentibus verbis: Calices, modicellas aviculas, sicut & alia parva naturæ incommoda, velut à Deo traditas ad exercitium patientiæ, vultu admodum perferbat, ut nec ipse opposita manu, nec exciente ventulum aliquo, eas conaretur abigere. Aliquando Clementi Merlino R. rotæ auditori, dum sermones familiares, ut fit post negotia decisa, fererent, retulit, se nocte ejus diei, qui est Catharinæ virginis sacer, addidit ad venas à bestiolis quibusdam nequam ac damnicis morsu suis vexatum, ut magno sensu conversus ad CHRISTI, præsentis à cruce Domini, simulacrum dixerit: ô Domine, si hoc quicquid est damni, quod certe parum est, mihi tantum affert molestiæ, equænam erunt supplicia damnatorum? si apud gebennam impios manent tormenta tam ærumnosa, ne, precor, in ea me projicias, etenim impar ero ipsam sustinendis. Cardinalis Cresscentius addit, Bellarminum ita se patientiæ velut quidam definasse, ut muscas à vultu ne depelleret."

ever sent him to Louvain, to put an End to the Disputes of Michael Baius there, or to make a Report of them at Rome [A A]. So many Persons have attacked him, and so many have defended him, that Catalogues have been made of both. The List of his Defenders was composed by Beraldi, an Italian (s).

(s) Baillet, Tom. I, of the Antiq., pag. 51, 52.

"ret quidem, tametsi adiectione nimium essent, sicuti Romæ in æstu solent; cunctque hoc mirarentur, qui aderant, ipse sicut, Haud æquum esse, ajebat, perturbare animantes illos, quibus non utique superesset paradisi alius, quam volitandi libertas, ac potestas, ubi maluit, commorandi (94). — Among the remarkable Virtues of Bellarmine, others place his wonderful Patience, in enduring Vexations, which James Fuligatti celebrates in the following Words: He considered Gnats, a little flying Insect, and other small Vexations, which Nature throws in our Way, as sent by God, to exercise our Patience; and he suffered them so calmly, that he neither endeavoured to drive them away with his own Hand, nor permitted any one else to do it. In a Conversation, once, as is usual after the Fatigue of Business, with Clemens Merlinus, Auditor of the Rota, he told him, that, on the Eve of the Festival of St Catherine, he was so tormented with the biting of pernicious Insects at his Reins, that, through the Acuteness of the Pain, turning to the Figure of our Saviour on the Cross, he cried out, O Lord! if This trifling Affliction gives me so much uneasiness, what must the Damned endure? If such dreadful Misery awaits the Wicked in Hell, O! never throw me into it, for I shall be unable to support it. Cardinal Crescentius adds, that Bellarmine had so devoted himself to Patience, that he would not drive the Flies from his Face, though they were extremely troublesome, as is usual at Rome, in hot Weather; which when the Standers by expressed their Wonder at, he mildly told them, It was unjust to diturb those little Creatures, whose only Paradise is the Liberty of flying, and resting, where they please." It is certain, there is a way of spinning out Consequences from the Evangelical Precepts, or Counsels, which leads almost necessarily to That Patience, which is attributed to Bellarmine; but nevertheless Reason shews us, that it is no ways likely, that JESUS CHRIST, or his Apostles, in recommending to us so expressly the Contempt of the Conveniences of Life, intended to forbid us the right of freeing ourselves from the Vexation of Bugs, and of driving away a Fly, which is troublesome to us. [A A] I do not believe the Pope ever sent him to Louvain to put an End to the Disputes of Baius, or to make a Report of them at Rome.] Mr Leydecker says, I. That Bellarmine was sent thither to inform himself of Those Disputes, and to pacify them; or, at least to give the Pope an Account of them. II. That he acquitted himself very well of This Commission, and that, after having heard Michael Baius, he returned to Rome, very angry for having found, that he treated, as Pelagian Doctrines, several Opinions of the Schoolmen, which were Bellarmine's own (95). I can find no trace of this Deputation in the Writers of This Jesuit's History; and I know, that he made but little Noise, when he went to Louvain. He acquired his first Reputation in the seven Years, that he taught Divinity in That Place (96); and, as he was an Augustinian as to the Points in dispute between Baius, and his Antagonists, it is not at all likely, he was ever angry with That Doctor, for the Reason, which Mr Leydecker mentions.

BELLEAU (REMI), a French Poet of the XVIth Century, was born at Notre le Rotrou. I shall not say much of him; for Moreri has already observed almost all that I could have collected. This Poet turned the Odes of Anacreon into French, and deprived them of a great part of their Beauty, if we may believe some Authors (a); but others maintain, that he equalled the Original, and that, if he had loved drinking as well as Anacreon did, he would have out-done him. Do not trust too much to This Encomium; for it is taken from a piece of Poetry, made by Scævola de Sainte Marthe, in praise of the French Translation, of which I am speaking (b). Pasquier thinks, that, in point of Gaiety, Belleau was another Anacreon in his Time (c) [A]. He acted one of the chief Parts in the Cleopatra, and the Rencontre of Jodelle, when they were acted before King Henry, at Paris, in the Palace of Reims — and in the College of Boncour (d). He died in 1577, and in his fiftieth Year (e). He commented on the second Part of the Amours of Peter Ronsard.

[A] Belleau, according to Pasquier, was another Anacreon in his Time.] This was also the Opinion of Andrew du Chêne. "The Country of Perche," says he (1), produced This gentle and learned Poet, among others, in the Reign of Henry II, whom I look upon as another Anacreon of our "Age, in Matters of Gaiety: I mean, Remi Belleau, whose Design was to imitate Sannazarius in his Works. For, as the Italian Sannazarius made the Shepherds of his Arcadia speak in Prose, in which he placed all his Tuscan Poetry; so our great Belleau has done the like in his Pastorals."

BELLFOREST (FRANCIS de), was born in the Month of November, 1530, near Samatan, a Town of the Country of Cominges, in Guienne (a). He was but seven, or eight, Years of Age, when his Father died: His Mother, finding herself without an Estate, did all she could to keep him some time at School. He was educated some Years in the House of the Queen of Navarre, Sister to Francis I. He studied, afterwards, at Bordeaux, under Buchanan, Vinetus, Salignac, Gélida, and some other learned Men; then he went to Toulouse, to study the Civil-Law there; but his Genius made him apply himself to quite another thing. He trifled away his time in making French Verses, to please the Ladies, and, having spent seven or eight Years among the Delights of the Nobility, and in the trifles of Gallantry, he went to Paris, where he attended the Professors Lectures, and contracted a strict Acquaintance with divers learned Men, and even insinuated himself into the Company of several Persons of Quality (b). He gained little, or nothing, by all This; inso-much, that, if the Bookfellers had not bought the Productions of his Pen, he had not had Bread to eat. Study was his Inheritance; and he was one of those Authors, who maintain their Families by dint of their Pens: His best Friends tell us, that, by the Blessing of God on the Labour of his Hands, he maintained his Family by his Books [A]. And, therefore, it is no wonder, if he wrote such a great Number of Books (c), and undertook to write upon so many different Subjects, which were beyond the reach of his Abilities: He was obliged to follow the Direction of the Bookfellers, and to turn himself every way, according to the Taste of the Public; that is, according as certain Books, good or bad, sold well. It is said of him, That he had Moulds, in which he cast new Books with great Expedition (d). He died at Paris, the first Day of January, 1583, and was buried in the Franciscan Church, as he had desired in his Will (e). Thevet, who was not a more considerable Author, boasted publicly, that Belleforest made him a public Reparation, on his Death-bed [B]. They had been much embroiled together. La Popeliniere speaks very ill of these two Authors [C]. Ghilini has committed a great many Faults in a short Elogy of Belleforest [D]; and, if he had been as ill informed in every thing else, his Works would be of no value.

[A] His best Friends tell us ----- that he maintained his Family by his Books.] Du Verdier Vau-Privas (1) declares himself Belleforest's intimate Friend, and Admirer. I received, says he, as much Satisfaction from our Correspondence by Letters, as I was afterwards sorry for his Death. ----- His Name will be immortal among Men, so long as the World endures, by reason of the fine Works, which he composed. Now let me how he speaks of his Friend's Fortune. Belleforest was intimately acquainted with Ronsard, Baif, Bellean, Vignere ----- Chopin, the Ornament of the Palace of Paris, and many others; he was cherished by Princes, beloved by the Nobility, and esteemed by all the virtuous Men of this Kingdom; but his Fortune was so mean, that he lived only by his Study; and the Labour of his Hands and Mind, being blessed with, and supported by, the Divine Grace, relieved the Necessities of his Family.

[B] Thevet ----- boasted publicly, that Belleforest made him Reparation, on his Death-bed.] There is nothing more dishonest than This Man's Proceeding. He glories in the Humility, which his Adversary exprest to him, on his Death-bed; and yet he abuses him, as much as he could have done, before their Reconciliation. These are his Words: "There are some, who, having no more Learning than Munster, have, nevertheless, been so bold as to scrawl after him, and new-mould him; which is the second Head, on which I ground my Complaint against Those, who, not having been much farther than the Smoak of their Chimnies, their Stoves, or Cottages, dare, in the mean Time, perfwade themselves, that there is no Spot of Ground, but what they have forgotten: but it is only in Imagination. To cover their too presumptuous Undertakings, they have stolen, here and there, as much as they could; and, sometimes, they have cut off small Pieces from the Discourses, which they have caltrated: So that most of their huge Books are only composed of patched Pieces, which have to ill a Grace, that, by what I can hear, they serve only to wrap up Butter, and Sugar. If I speak to openly, it is because I am sorry Belleforest was so indiscreet as to patch up Munster's Cosmography. I question not but some will think, that what I say of it proceeds from a Spirit of Revenge, and that, having been provoked by him, I intend at present to pour out the Fury of my Anger upon him. God shall be my Witness: And, truly, if he had offended me more than he did, I would not satirize, and speak ill of, a dead Man. Besides, at the end of his Life, acknowledging the Wrong, which he knew he had done, in printing those Books, wherein, against his Conscience, he asperged the Characters of good Men, and of those, who patronized and supported them; he sent for me, and, in the Presence of two Doctors of the Sorbonne, and of his Physician, and Bookeller Gabriel Buon, after having kissed my Hands, he confessed publicly, that he felt his Conscience burthened for the blame he had laid on me; for which he asked my Pardon several times. As for me, I desired him, the best I could, not to think any more of it: forasmuch as we are all Men (2)."

[C] La Popeliniere speaks very ill of these two Authors.] I shall set down, somewhat at length, what he has said of them, and I hope, it will not displease those, who love to see things in the original Authors, and who would find it difficult to procure the Author, whom I quote. "These two Men, sometimes Friends, and sometimes Enemies, have deserved the worse of Learning, as they were unworthy to treat of it. Nay, they were as destitute of Wit, Judgment, Memory, and all the Qualifications of a good Genius, as they were supplied with Boldness to interpret ill, and write worse, what they never understood. And, because some hasty Travels of the one, and the Itch of Writing, which possessed the other, made their Essays acceptable to the Vulgar, who neither will, nor can, take time to examine things well; they set up for Scribblers, at such a rate, that all the Printers of Paris, preferring their mean Capacity to all Judicious Works, strove to buy up, publish, and make them appear to all the World. And, tho' they were never well instructed in their Youth, nay, without any considerable Experience of the things of this World, and, moreover, poor and destitute of all the Means, which the most knowing Men have always called the Wings of Virtue; yet these universal Wits have passed through all Professions. There is no Language, or Science, but what they have prophaned. Nay, they have scribbled Histories, Particular, and Universal, according to their foolish Fancies. How can one help it? As all Sessions are attended with certain Accidents, which bring evil to All, and good to none, the Causes whereof are unknown to us, and cannot be imputed to the Faults of Men: So there have always been, and ever will be, certain private Men, in all States, who, being only fit to confound and spoil every thing, undertake nothing, but what will prejudice others, and profit no Body. These Men are like Itching, the Forerunner of a Sickness to Those, who are troubled with it. Their Hands itched; they could not forbear writing; not for the Public Good, but for their particular Profit; which they kept up with the wretched Labour of their unruly Pens. So that I have often lamented, that, France being so well provided with good Writers, such low Genius's, who can boast of nothing but an assiduous, and useless, Labour, should find People, who will throw away their Time in reading their Nonsense, their Annals, Histories, and Universal Geographies, contrived, formed, hatched, and published in their solitary Dens. Those, who do not take the Pains to inform themselves of the Particulars of the World, and chiefly to observe the Course, and Issue, of each Man's private Actions, cannot believe, how much prejudice Belleforest and Thevet have done to Youth, and consequently to the State; explaining abundance of Passages to ill, and many times in a quite contrary Sense; corrupting, and falsifying, Matters; and taking many things for granted, which they had ridiculously fancied in their own weak Brains. Without mentioning a World of other Impertinences, wherewith they have patched up their silly Writings. Neither of the two Cato's would in this have excused Belleforest, (though he boasted to have written as much as St Augustine) if Poverty made him speak like a Jay, that is, like a Beast. For he has shewed himself too brutish on all accounts towards Posterity (3)."

[D] Ghilini has committed a great many Faults, in a short Elogy.] What he said of our Belleforest contains, in all, but Twenty two Lines. These are his Errors: He takes Cominges for a City of Calagne: he affirms, that Belleforest published several Works in Latin, and, among others, The Annals of France in two Volumes; The History of nine Kings of France, whose

(3) Popeliniere's History of Histories, pag. 456.

whose Names were Charles; The Universal History, or an Abridgement of Cosmography. All this is false: Their Works, and all the other Books of This Author, were written in French. Giblin adds, that there is a Catalogue of the Illustrious Men, who have made themselves famous, in Monasteries, both by their Learnings, and their Actions, and An History of the Holy Martyrs, in three Volumes, written by This Author. But there is no manner of likelihood, that This Catalogue was ever printed. La Croix du Maine never saw it; and he knew only, that Bellesforest mentions it in the Hundred ninety third Leaf of his Cosmography. Du Verdier Vau-Prison, an intimate Friend of Bellesforest, says nothing of This Catalogue; and no one is ignorant, that Authors refer to Works, which they have not yet made Public. The same du Verdier informs us, that "The Life, Passion, and Burial of St Denis, the Apostle, and of his Companions, who were his fellow-Martyrs, collected out of divers Authors, by the late John, Doctor of Divinity, great Prior of the Abbey of St Denis in France, and done into French

"by Bellesforest, is printed in the Third Volume of the History of the Lives and Deaths of the Saints (4)." This is the notable ground, on which Three Volumes of the History of the Holy Martyrs are ascribed to Bellesforest by Giblin, not as a Translation, but as an Original. He attributes also the Translation of St Cyprian's Works to him. If he had committed Vau-Prison, he would have said there, that This Writer translated only some Treatises of St Cyprian (5), and that all the Works of That Saint were translated by James Tixeret. Lastly, Giblin is somewhat to be blamed for not knowing the Year of Bellesforest's Death, and for placing it about the Year 1655. As for the excessive Praises, with which he crowns This Author's Memory, They might be reckoned among his Faults, were it not that many other Writers might lead him into This Profusion. I shall quote but one of Them. René de Laing, speaking of Bellesforest, says, He is a Man of great Reading, who is not ignorant of any Thing, which is left confused in Antiquity, the Passages of which he clears up with great Care, and in good Language (6).

BELLEY, a City of France, and Capital of the Province of Bugei, is very ancient, since the Episcopal See was established there in the Year 412 (a). Consult the Dictionary of Moreri, and add to it what follows: "The Diocese of Belley — has four Towns, six large Boroughs, and more than Two hundred Villages, being extended ten Leagues in Diameter (b). The Dignity of a Prince of the Empire is added to That of Bishop of Belley; a Title, which was given by the Emperors to the Archbishop of Bezançon, and his three Comprovincials, or Suffragans, Basil, Lausanne, and Belley. The Sovereignty of the City of Belley, and it's Territory, which is pretty wide, belonged to the Bishop. But he was deprived of it gradually, by a powerful and neighbouring Prince, under the Disguise and Appearance of Protection. There are still extant, in the Archives of the Church, several Excommunications issued on this Occasion, and many others of Opposition, and Resistance; but, in these Cases, Right is on the side of Power (c)." Since That Time the Revenues of the Bishopric have greatly decreased; for "it's largest Possessions consisted in the Rights, which This Rebel Lordship has usurped, and which were confined almost wholly to the City (d)." This is what I borrow from a Work of Mr Camus, Bishop of Belley, published in 1644; in which he deduces these Facts, with some Observations, in order to refute a Monk, who had spoken disrespectfully of This Bishopric [A]. I find, in Guichenon, that John de Passelaigue, Bishop of Belley, obtained of Lewis XIII, in 1635, a Confirmation of all the Privileges, granted to the Bishops of Belley, by the Emperor Frederic — excepting however the Regale, and the coining of Money (e). This John de Passelaigue succeeded John Peter Camus, who began to govern This Diocese in the Year 1609, and who found many Disorders in the Convents [B], particularly in That of St Sulpice. I shall take Occasion to remark the

[A] Some Observations, in order to confute a Monk, who had spoken disrespectfully of This Bishopric.] This Monk had written a Book, entitled The Anti-Camus. At the Thirty ninth Page were These Words. It is very strange, that a little neglected Bishopric behind the Alps, whose Name is scarce to be met with in the Archives of the Church, and whose Pastor, for want of Employment at home (his District is so small) goes about preaching, like a Franciscan, should pretend, not only to equal, but to exalt itself above the Pope, to abolish their Order, and reform their Regulations. The Diocese is not so small, replies Mr Camus (1), but I can name to him five Archbishoprics, and more than Twenty five Bishoprics, in France, of smaller Extent; more than twelve of which the sole Provinces of Languedoc and Provence can furnish. I will prove to him twenty Archbishoprics, and an Hundred and twenty Bishoprics, in Italy, of smaller Extent, than the Diocese of Belley. — It is not behind the Alps, if you do not consider the Alps on the Side of Italy, in like manner, as, with regard to us, the Archbishopric of Turin is hid behind the Alps. Though it were in the Alps, Would it be the less considerable? How many noble Archbishoprics, and Bishoprics, are there in this Great World of Hills? Ambrun, Torantaise, Grenoble, Gavanne (2), Maurienne, Syon, Lausanne, Constance, Basil, Arles, Jorée: All Dioceses of Note, Churches Famous, and celebrated for their Antiquity and Extent. — I will prove to him that the Antiquity of the Diocese, which he calls so small, is more than a thousand Years, and that "there are, in France alone, more than thirty or forty Bishoprics of later Date. — Bishoprics are not to be measured by their Revenues: otherwife a Curacy of Sicily, which I could name, and which has but One Cure, with Thirty thousand Crowns per annum, would be a large Archbishopric (3)." Here are some particulars, which will gratify the Curiosity of several Readers, though they are not necessary to the Article of Belley.

[B] John Peter Camus found many Disorders in the Convents of the Diocese of Belley.] The following is part of the Description, which he gives of these Disorders. "There was An Abbey (4) of Monks, richly founded, whose Abbot was an Huguenot Captain, a married Man, and Governor of a neighbouring Fortress, who kept the whole Country about him in Awe and Fear (5)."

He took it into his Head to keep a Stud in the Convent, and "having collected a great Number of Mares, which are very large and fine in Bresse, he sent for Stallions from Spain and Germany, and large Asses from Auvergne which are of an enormous Size, in order to produce Mules by their Mixture with the Mares, according to the Method established in This Stud. — The Church, which was as large as a Cathedral, served as a Repository for Hay, Straw, and other Forrage, necessary for the Sustainance of these Animals, during four or five Months of the Winter, that the Earth is all covered with Snow. The Monks had but just the Liberty of part of the Choir about the Altar, to sing the Service in, where they continued to do it the pious Fraud, which was published concerning the Foundation of This Monastery [C].

"it with Negligence enough. In the Abbot's House were several Huguenot Soldiers, with their Trulls (a Baggage inseparable from the pretended Reformation of Those of the fifth Gospel); and there they said their Prayers, sung their Psalms, and lived, in short, a merry Life, like Reapers at Harvelt, Grape-gatherers, or Conquerors, when they divide the Spoils of their Enemies. — The pretended reformed Abbot, to stop the Mouths of the Monks, and prevent their Complaints, augmented their Prebends, or Canonical Portions, and, thro' Artifice, and worldly Prudence, caressed them extremely, admitting them to his Table in the Citadel, where he entertained them like an Abbot and a Captain, supporting them in their Humours, and protecting them against all the neighbouring Nobility. The Intimacy became so great, that they styled him Our Abbot, and He them My Monks, and said My Abbey, when he spoke of their House.

"You are not to think, that the Monks spent their Time in catechising the Soldiers, Governors of the Stud, and their Companies, which might have been formed into another Stud of Rational Brutes. — This Convent became A Church Militant: for you might see Monks a-hunting with Soldiers, each with his Musket on his Shoulder: the Monks never stirred abroad but upon large Horses, and the better according to the Permission and Indulgence of the Abbot, always well armed, with Sword and Pistol, and often with Carbine: they were seen every Day traversing the Country in This Equipage; insomuch, that it might be said of them, as of the Scutamate, in the Canticles, that they were Choirs of Warriours, and Battalions of Choristers (6).

(6) Ibid, p. 333.

This fine Management continued eight or nine Years. The Bishop sometimes threatened to inform the Parliament, or the King's Governor, or Lieutenant, of it, in order to put a Stop to such scandalous Proceedings: but the Monks, on the one side, made themselves wittier by their Exemptions and Privileges, than their Habits; and, on the other, threatened him with the Power of the Abbot, who, as a formidable Scourge, kept the Nobility, Church, and People of the Country, in awe. And, as a Proof of his Violence, and Power, he went so far, as even to make an Attempt on the Person of the Governor, who had a Man slain at his Feet, after the Manner related in the French Mercury. — The King, to punish this Attempt, commanded the Citadel to be razed; and the Tyrant was turned out of it, as well as of his Abbey; and afterwards, retiring among the Huguenots of Languedoc, from whence he sprang, he was assassinated by Those of the same Party, and his nearest Relations, during the Siege of Montauban. The Abbey was put into the Hands of a Professed Abbot of the same Order, who, at least, removed the Scandal of the Stud (7).

(7) Ibid, p. 334.

At the Foot of the same Hill, is a Convent of Nuns, of the same Order: of whom the above-named Monks call themselves the Fathers; and are indeed so; for they have the Direction and Visitation of them. Here are no traies, or postlepis, of a Cleyster, nor any kind of Regulation. It is a General Landing Place to all Companies; a true Watering-Place of Africa: and surprizing Intercourses are there carried on, under the Pretence of Relation and Conianguinity. Whenever The Captain-Abbot, mentioned above, came, with the Officers of his Regiment, to fire his Stud, he went down to pay a Visit to the Monastery of the Valley, where he was received with great Respect; and we may suppose, that he made them fine Exhortations from the ninth Verse of the seventh Chapter of the First to the Corinthians. Thus there was a perpetual Intercourse of Conversations, and Familiarities. — A continual Flux, and Reflux, of Companies; the Great entered, the Small went out; The Gate was open to All, without respect to Sex, or Age. — In short, Confusion reigned there; and the Wound became so desperate, for want of Judgment and Discretion, that Licentiousness was there taken for Innocent Freedom, and Libertinism supplied the Place of Liberty (8).

(8) Ibid.

In vain did the Bishop publicly exhort, and remonstrate, again and again, against these Abuses. "At last, he gave them to understand, that he was bound in Conscience not to suffer these Irregulari*ties any longer; since the Council of Trent had ordered the Bishops and Ordinaries to see that the Nuns keep their Vows, whatever Privileges their Orders might lay claim to: Having apprized them of this; do but hear the Vanity and Presumption of Two Reverends, who, at different Times, had had the Conduct of this Bessed Flock; and who expressly opposed This Reformation: the first replied, that the Council of Trent had been held by Bishops, and, consequently, that they were not bound to obey it, because their Order was privileged, and exempt from the Jurisdiction of Bishops, and that the Councils of Monks were their General Chapters. The Other, more artful, alledged, that This Council having consisted but of [trente] thirty Bishops, though there had been forty or fifty, it could have no Place in the Universal Church, of which the Monks made the most illustrious Part, the most perfect and complete, as being in a State of Perfection. There was One Nun, of a fine, I know not whether of a good Wit, who, being prepossessed (not to say prompted ) by these excellent Tutors, or rather Fathers, replied, one Day, to the Remonstrances of M. D. B. My Lord, You seem to me resolved to broil us all alive, though we have not deterred it. To which He replied readily, but coldly: My Sister, you plainly shew, by your Discourte, that you are very lively, and but little dead to yourself. I mean very little mortified: for, as The Fifth, which is yet alive, leaps from the Gridiron, and tumbles among the Coals, which a dead one does not do: So those Nuns, who are not well dead to the World, and whose Passions are alive, and often vivifying, chafe rather, like Salamanders and Pirallides, to live amidst the Fire of Conversation, according to the Thought of St Bernard, who compares a Monk, conversing with the World unhurt, to the Miracle of the three Children in the Furnace, than to remain enclosed within a Grate †, crucified with JESUS CHRIST, their Spouse. So little able were M. C. the Abbot, who succeeded the Captain, and all the Superiors of the Order, either to confine, or reform, these good Ladies, of whom, out of Decency and Modesty, I shall say no more, leaving the rest to the Imagination of the Reader, who, from what has been said, may form conjectures of what is hid under the Curtain of Silence (9).

* The Original is a Play upon Words, signifying, pour ne dire Souffrance.

† The same Word (Grate) in French, signifies both a Gridiron, and a Grate of a Manufactory.

(9) Anti-basilic, p. 335.

The Book, from whence I borrow These Fragments, has not been omitted by Mr Baillet, in his curious List of ANTI's, any more than the ANTI-HERMITE, and ANTI-MOINE, of the same Mr Camus. He says of the two latter, that they shared so in the fate of the rest of this Author's Works, that it is scarce known, that there ever were such Books. If they continue running on, with the same Precipitation, as hitherto, to Annihilation, the Memory of them will very soon be effaced; and it will be difficult to preserve even their Names in Booksellers Catalogues (10). This is equally applicable to That entitled, The Anti-Basilic, in answer to the Anti Camus, by Olenix of Bourg-l'Abbe. I have, therefore, reason to believe, that the long Extracts, I have given of this Work, will be more agreeable, than if I had made use of a Reference, which would have been useless to the greatest Part of my Readers.

(10) Baillet's Anti's Art. 106.

It will be proper to take notice of some Instances of Neglect in the Narrative of Mr Camus. I. He does not Name the Huguenot Abbot, nor the Citadel, of which he was Governor. I supply this Defect, and say, that he speaks of Peter d'Esclapart, Lord of Boisse, Baron of Pardailan, Colonel of Horse of the Regiment of Champagne, and Governor of the Citadel of Bourg in Bresse. II. He was of Guienne, and not of Languedoc. III. The Disorder, he was guilty of, shall, if you please, continue eight or nine Years, but not in Sight of Mr de Bellei, who was not consecrated Bishop, till the Year 1669. Now the Citadel of Bresse was razed in the Year 1611 (11). IV. The King, at that time, was not, as yet, out of his Minority: V. And it cannot be said, that the Governor committed all these Outrages under the Minority of Lewis XIII.

[C] The pious Fraud, which was published concerning the Foundation of This Monastery. "The Ancient

"cient Manuscript Chronicle of Savoy - - - - - imports, that Amé, the second of the Name, First Earl of Savoy, and Lord of Bugey, made a Vow to found an Abbey in his Estates, in order to obtain Issue; after which he had a Son, called Humbert, who falling sick, and being in danger of dying, before the Accomplishment of the Vow, his Father built, and founded, the Abbey of St Sulpice, in Bugey, at the Persuasion of the Councils "of Savoy, his Wife." The Words of the Chronicle are These.

It happened one Night, that the Countess, as she lay in Bed, figured several Times; The Earl enquired the Reason of it. Sir, said she, I fear the loss of our Son Humbert. Why? replied He: Because, said the Lady, you have made a Vow to our Lord to found an Abbey, in case God grants us Issue, and you have forgotten to perform it, and seem not to care for it. Then the Earl replied; Doubt not, but I will, shortly, accomplish it, God willing. Then he sought for a proper Place; and, finding it, he built a fine Abbey on a Mountain, situated in Bugey, under the Name of the Confessor, St Sulpice; which he properly endowed, and established an Abbot, and Monks, to praise God for the Issue he had granted him. Parasin, in his History of Savoy, has exactly followed the Manuscript Chronicle of Savoy; and adds, that, when the Abbey was finished, and the Vow accomplished, the young Prince of Savoy recovered; placing the Time of this Foundation before the Year 1118 (12). Guichenon refutes all this very solidly: He says, that he found, in the Archives of St Sulpice, that, in the Year 1130, "Fifteen Monks, of the Order of Cîteaux, and one Bernard, who was their Superior, went to the Mountains of Bugey, by Permission of Hugb, Abbot of Pontigni, with a Design of doing "Penance there, and leading an austere Life; and that Amé, the first Earl of Savoy, who was preparing to go to the Holy Land, in order to engage their Stay, granted them Letters, and Privileges. - - - - As to the Occasion of the Foundation, it is certain, that the Historians of Savoy are mistaken, in publishing, that it was after the Birth of the young Earl Humbert, Son of the said Amé - - - - for the Grants of Earl Amé import the direct contrary; the first of which, dated at Yenne, in the Presence of Pontius, Bishop of Belley, and Humbert, Bishop of Geneva, has these Words: *Ignitur quicumque ista legerit, & audierit, hoc donum me fecisse cognoscit, tempore quo in montanis fratribus hospitatio retinebatur, scilicet antequam de uxore mea haurissem infantem; i. e. Be it known to all, who shall read, or hear, these Presents, that I bestowed this Gift, at the time, when I entertained the Brothers in the Mountains; that is, before I had a Child by my Wife: and the second; Noverit omnis tam extraneus, quam propinquus, hanc meam donationem fecisse, antequam de uxore mea, Matildis nomine, liberum aliquem procreassem; i. e. Be it known to All, Strangers as well as Natives, that this Grant was made before my Wife Matilda had brought me any Children (13)."*

(13) Ibid. pag. 102.

I cannot persuade myself, that Chance, or Ignorance, produced the Falshood, which Guichenon has refuted. It is rather the Effect of the Artifice of the Ecclesiastics. They bring Water to their Mill whatever way they can; and to encourage the Great to build Monasteries, or give pious Donations, they forge Instances of Fruitfulness, or Recovery, or some other temporal Advantage, which they ascribe to a Liberal Piety.

BELOY (PETER de (a), Advocate-General in the Parliament of Toulouse, had not yet this Employ, when he wrote for the Rights of the King of Navarre, against the League. If he had been a Protestant, he would have done nothing, in This, but what had been very natural, and required no extraordinary Virtue; but, as he was a Roman Catholic (b), and at Paris, when he published That Work against the League, he ought to be looked upon with some Admiration. That Work is entituled, A Catholic Apology against the Libels, Declarations, Councils, and Consultations, made, written, and published, by the Leaguers, Disturbers of the Peace of the Kingdom of France, who have taken up Arms, since the Decease of Monseigneur, the King's only Brother; by E. D. L. I. C. It came out in the Year 1585, and was translated into Latin [A]: The Writers of the League called it an infamous Libel [B], and the Author found himself exposed to a severe Persecution [C]. He was a learned Civilian,

(a) He is G. d. d. and n. r. Peter Bellot.

(b) See The Novenary Chronology of Cayet, Tom. I, fol. 17, verso.

[A] His Catholic Apology was translated into Latin [I] have seen two Translations of it in That Language. One of them, if we believe the Title, was printed, at Paris, by James Petit Chou, 1586. In the other, we find neither the Place of the Impression, nor the Printer's Name; but the Title is longer than in the Original; and there is an Advertisement of the Translator.

[B] The Leaguers called it an infamous Libel.] See the Book, entituled, An Answer of the true French Catholics to the Advertisement of the English Catholics for the Exclusion of the King of Navarre from the Crown of France. The Edition, which I make use of, is of the Year 1589. On the back of the Title-page, you find a Catalogue of the Diffamatory Libels, at which That Answer is levelled: The Catholic Apology by Belloy is the Third of Those Libels. I have seen a particular Answer to the chief Heads of That Work of Belloy, which passes for a Piece of Bellarmin's. The Author calls himself Franciscus Romulus. He neither attacks his Adversary, about the Genealogy of the House of Bourbon, nor about the Bastardy, which was objected to Henry IV, by reason of his Mother's Marriage with the Duke of Cleves; nor about the Dispute of the Preference of the Uncle to the Nephew; but reduces all to Religion, and to the Foundation of the Bull, which declared the King of Navarre to have forfeited the Succession, and to be incapable of reigning, only on account of his Heresy. The first thing, which Franciscus Romulus undertakes to shew, is, that the Author of the Apology is no Catholic, as he boasts himself to be, but a meer Heretic, or perhaps an Atheist. Nos igitur, us ejus vultibus infirmamus, demonstrabimus.

VOL. I. N^o. XXIV.

mus primum Auctorem Apologiæ falso sibi Catholici nomen assumere, cum aut hæreticus, aut fortasse etiam Atheus sit (1). This it is to be over-fond of certain particular Doctrines, which, at the bottom, are not essential to Religion. They, who are fond of these particular Doctrines, impudently maintain, that whoever opposes them is a False Brother, a Prevaricator, a Spy, a Traytor, and, to say all in a Word, an Atheist. In all Communions, there are some such opinionated Persons, without excepting the Protestants, who have quitted France. Bellarmin may serve to shew them their Illusion; for He, whom he accused of Heresy, and whom he suspected of Atheism, always professed the Catholic Religion, like a very good Man. Here is a Passage of Anthony Arnauld: "Who wrote That outrageous Answer against the Catholic Apology, but the Jesuits, who industriously published the most false and scandalous Things imaginable against the Person, and Rights, of his present Majesty (2)?"

[C] He found himself exposed to a severe Persecution.] Cayet relates, that, at the time of his writing his Book (3), they drew up a Parallel between the chief Writer of the Royalists, and the chief Writer of the Leaguers (4). He means Peter Belloy, and Lewis d'Orleans. It was said, "that both of them published their Books without their Names; He, who wrote for the League, was more eloquent, but a Calumniator; He, who wrote for the King of Navarre, was more learned, and a true Frenchman. The Writer of the League, contrary to the Royalist, was first rewarded for his Writings, and was made Advocate-General in the Sovereign Court of the Kingdom, during the Power of the League;

lian, and a Man of great Reading. He had already published some other Books [D]. Du Plessis Mornai acknowledges him for the true Author of the Catholic Apology (c). I shall produce the Fragment of a Letter, which will be a good Supplement to This Article [E].

I add, to what I have already said, the true Duration of his Imprisonment. Cayet is satisfied with saying, that it lasted more than two Years (d); but Beloy relates, that it continued four Years. I shall produce his Words, which will serve as a Supplement to the List, I give, of his Works [F].

"and since he has met with much Trouble and Vexation. . . . But He, who wrote in defence of the Majesty of Kings, had Trouble and Afflictions, and was imprisoned in the beginning. In the Year 88, (5) he was clapt up in the Jail belonging to the Parliament (6). After the Death of the Duke of Guise, he was removed, and strictly kept in the Bastile for two Years; and, having found means to escape, he fled to St Dennis, where he found Monf. de Vic, Governor for the King, who received him, presented him to his Majesty; and, for a Recompence of his Troubles, he is at this Day Advocate-General in one the Parliaments of this Kingdom (7)." The Fate of these two Authors, was, therefore, an Image of what was said to the Rich Man (8); but it was an imperfect one; for Lewis d'Orleans prospered again, after having endured some Fatigues, much more inconsiderable, than what he deserved, by reason of his furious Rebellions.

[D] He had already published some other Books.] La Croix du Maine mentions the four following: A Declaration of the Right of lawful Succession to the Kingdom of Portugal, belonging to the Queen-Mother of the Most Christian King, at Antwerp, and at Paris, 1582, in 8vo. A Panegyric or Remonstrance for the Senecal and Judges . . . of Toulouse, against the King's Notaries, and Secretaries of the said City, at Paris, 1582, in 4to. A Verbal Petition for the above-said Lords, and Officers of Toulouse, containing an Apology for, and Defence of, the Advertisement, published in the Name of the Doctors Regents of the University of Toulouse, at Paris, 1583, in 8vo. A brief Explication of this present Year 1583, according to the Gregorian Calendar, at Paris, 1583, in 8vo. La Croix du Maine adds, that a Work of the same Beloy was printing at Paris, in 1584. viz. A Computation of the Times since the Creation of the World, till 1582, divided into two several Columns; and that he would speak, in another Place, of the Latin Works of This Author. The Catalogue of the Bodleian Library mentions two Books; Petri Belii variorum Juris Civilis, liber 4. & Disputatio de successione ab intestato, &c. at Paris, 1583, and the Collation of the Edicts of Pacification with the Explication of the said Edicts, at Paris, in 1600, in 8vo. Beloy is Author of a Commentary on the Edict, which ordered the uniting of the King's Patrimony to the Crown-Lands, at Toulouse, 1608, in 8vo.

[E] A Fragment of a Letter, which will be a good Supplement to this Article.] Here you have what the Author of the Notes on the Confession of Sanci, and on the Catholicism, was pleased to write to me; "I have a Book, which might have given you much Light concerning the famous Civilian, Peter Beloy: The Title of it is; A Reply to the Answer, which the Leaguers have published against the Examination, which was drawn up, of their pretended Discourse concerning the Salic Law of France, 1587. There is in it an ample and fine Genealogy of Peter Beloy, in honour of That Learned Man, and which proves him a Gentleman of a Family originally of Bretagne, and transplanted into Languedoc, and elsewhere; but the most singular thing, I find in it, is, that it appears, that Peter Beloy was already Prisoner in the 1587; and, consequently, that it was King Henry III. who caused him to be imprisoned, in compliance to the Guises, who accused him, moreover, of being a Shuffler, and a Heretic, and who had already caused him to be accused, the foregoing Year, before the King, by a Bishop, — whom I suspect to be G. Rozze, of having wrote the Book, for which, Thuanus informs us, that Francis le Breton, who was the Author of it, was hanged, in 1586. It appears, there, also, that Beloy was of a Family, whereof all the Members, and particularly himself, had always been good Catholics; that, at the Age of Twenty one Years, he was named Regent of the University of Toulouse, by the University itself, and by the Parliament; that, afterwards, after having performed the Function of an Advocate, four or five Years, at Toulouse, he was made Counsellor in the President of That City, with Marks of a most honourable Distinction by the Parliament of Paris; and that, what had given an Advantage against him, at Paris, to his Enemies, the Leaguers, was, that, during this long Abode, which he was obliged to make there, as a Deputy of his Brethren, to the Court (9), his Zeal for his Prince, and his Country, had moved him to oppose several ill Designs of the League. Moreover, I must observe, that, since it is certain, that he was already a Prisoner, in 1587, there is no Reason to say, that he was not imprisoned 'till 1588. Mr Menage has quoted a Discourse at the opening of one of the Settings of Parliament, spoken by Peter Beloy, in the Year 1609 (10). The Author of this Letter has inserted part of these Facts in the second Edition of his Notes on the Confession of Sanci (11), and he observes one thing, which I ought not to omit; which is, that our Beloy was born in the City of Montauban (12), and that his three elder Brothers were killed in the King's Service against the Huguenots.

[F] This Remark will serve as a Supplement to the List — of his Works.] The Epistle Dedicatory (13) of his Exposition of Daniel's Seventy Weeks contains these Words. "Finding myself at Leisure, during the last Summer, I was pressed, and almost compelled, by my Friends, to look over again, and review, part of The Computation of Times (14), which I formerly drew up in the Prison of the Bastille of Paris, where I was confined during the four Years Tyranny of the League, in order to the Publication of This Essay." Conclude from this, that he would have published other Works of this Nature, and the more from his calling this little Dissertation on Daniel's Weeks, The first Essay of his Historical Discourses. We must, therefore, add this Dissertation to the Catalogue of Beloy's Works. It is entitled, An Exposition of the Prophecy of the Angel Gabriel, touching the seventy Weeks, described by the Prophet Daniel, in the ninth Chapter of his Prophecies, by Mr Peter de Beloy, &c. at Toulouse, 1605, in 8vo. The following have, likewise, been omitted. Of the Origin and Institution of several Orders of Knight-hood, as well Ecclesiastical as Secular, dedicated to Monseigneur the Dauphin of Viennois, Duke of Bretagne; at Montauban, for Dennis Hautin, 1604, in 8vo. An Arrêt of the Parliament of Toulouse, pronounced in Appeal as of a Grievance reprehended by Father John Journe, a Monk of the Order of St Dominic, and Provincial of the said Order in the Province of Toulouse, on the Proceeding against him, ordered by the Bishops of Condom and d' Aure, containing The Pleading on this Affair, by Mr Peter de Beloy, Counsellor and Advocate-General of the King in the said Parliament, at Paris, according to the Copy printed at Toulouse, in 1612, in 8vo (15).

(15) Taken from a Manuscript Memoir, communicated by Mr Lancelot, of the Mazarine Library at Paris.

B E L O T (N.), Advocate in the King's Privy-Council, under the Reign of Lewis XIII, published a Book, which gave occasion to place him, with little Honour, in the famous Petition of the Dictionaries [A]. He undertook to prove, that our Language ought not to be made use of in learned Works, alledging, among other Reasons, that the communicating the Secrets of Sciences to the People has produced great Evils. He promised another Work [B], wherein he was to shew the Particulars of That Proof.

[A] He published a Book, which gave Occasion to place him --- in the famous Petition of the Dictionaries.] Mr Pellisson makes mention of it: "At that time, if I am not mistaken, the Sieur Belot, Advocate, dedicated also a Book to the Academy, which I could not find, and which is not mentioned in the Registers, entituled, An Apology for the Latin Tongue; and it was That, which gave occasion to This fine Passage in the Petition of the Dictionaries.

"La pauvre langue Latiale
"Alloit être trouffée en male,
"Si le bel Advocat Belot, &c. (1)."

(1) Pellisson's History of the French Academy, p. 195, 196.

What Mr Pellisson means by &c. cætera contains eleven Verses, which are these;

Du Barreau le plus grand salot,
N'en eust pris en main la defense,
Et protégé son innocence.
En quoy, certes, & sa bonté,
Et son zele, & sa charité,
Se firent d'autant paroître,
Qu'il n'a l'honneur de la connoître;
Semblable à ces preux Chevaliers,
Ces Paladins Avanturiers,
Qui, defendant des Inconnus,
Ont porté leur nom jusqu'aux nuës.

*Thy Language, Latium, ill had fared;
But Belot, Advocate prepared,
Thy Patron stands, Thy strong Defence,
And vouches for Thy Innocence.
In truth, Belot, a generous Friend,
A Tongue, he knows not, to defend.
Like those adventurous Knights of old,
Don Quixots so renown'd and bold;
Who, fighting for a Fair unknown,
Great Prowess have in Combat shewn.*

I have That Book, which Mr Pellisson could not find; and I am going to say something of it; for it must be but little known, since, in the Year 1650 (2), it escaped the most curious Enquirers. The Title of it is: An Apology for the Latin Tongue, against the Preface of Monsieur de la Chambre, in his Book of new Conjectures about Digestion, dedicated to Monseigneur

Seigneur Seguer, Chevalier, Chancellor of France. It was printed, at Paris, in the Year 1637, in 8vo, and contains about eighty Pages, including the Epistle Dedicatory, the Preface, &c. The Author says (3), that he was forced to publish it, and tells the occasion of it. "You must know, that Monsieur de la Chambre --- having obliged me to give him my Opinion concerning his first Treatise, my Freedom made me find Fault with him as to the Language; and, having, nevertheless, continued to write in French, he thought himself obliged to prefix a Preface to his Book, entituled, New Conjectures about Digestion, in favour of our Language, against the Latin, which, being addressed to me, under the Name of Reader, I found myself obliged to answer it by this Apology, which my Friends got out of my Hands, by making use of the Authority of such Persons, as might command me to give it to the Public (4). At the end of his Book, he added the Letter, which he wrote to the Gentlemen of the French Academy.

(4) Belot, Preface, fol. A. ii.

[B] He promised another Work.] Note, that he would have Mr Seguer interest himself in This Cause for political Reasons. The Welfare of the State, said he, and That of Religion are concerned in it. According to his Account, the ancient Romans suffered by having used the vulgar Language in every thing. "Such are the Effects, which the Secrets of the Learned, unseasonably discovered to the People, have produced among the Romans, and whereof the Example would be as dangerous to our Monarchy, as it was prejudicial to That Empire. I omit the fine Considerations, which might be drawn from each Science, and which would make it more clearly appear, of what Moment it is to keep them secret, or, at least, not to declare them but to such Persons, as may be qualified for it. You will find matter of Wonder, and Astonishment, in a Treatise of Politics, which I have entituled, France, or The perfect Monarchy, when you come to consider, that the Knowledge of Philosophy, imparted to the People, has produced so many Busy-Bodies, and Sophisters, the Knowledge of Divinity to many Heretics, and Atheists, That of Morality to many Hypocrites, and false Virtues, and That of Physic (because 'tis professed in our Language) to many Quacks, and Murderers, who kill more Men than the Plague, and the War, both together, and who have no other way of livelihood, than That of killing so many People with Impunity (5). It is not useless to preserve the Memory of such false turns of the human Mind; They are Poisons, which may serve as Remedies.

B E M B U S (P E T E R), a noble Venetian, Secretary to Leo X [A], and afterwards Cardinal, was one of the best Writers of the XVIth Century; though it must be agreed, that he made himself sometimes ridiculous, by an affected way of making use only of ancient Latin Words [B]. His History of Venice was very much censured

[A] He was Secretary to Leo X.] He wrote a great many Letters for That Pope; he was handsomely rewarded for them; and, besides, he had the Honour of being looked upon as the Author of all Those Letters; for they came out under his Name, and with Those, which he had wrote for himself. The latter are divided into six Books, and the others into sixteen. Leo X had another Secretary, who was as great a Purist as Bembus (1). He made choice of them before he came out of the Conclave, where he was promoted to the Papacy (2). Mr Gravelot, the Advocate, would have published, with some Notes, the Letters, which they wrote for That Pope, if an untimely Death had not put a stop to That Work.

(1) It was James Salotti, who was afterwards Cardinal.

(2) Bembus, Hist. rerum Venetar. in fine.

[B] Made himself sometimes ridiculous by an affected way of making use only of ancient Latin Words.] "How many Follies has the Affectation of making use only of Cicero's Words, and of what is called pure Latinity, caused certain Italian Authors to commit? Who would not laugh to hear Bembus say, that a Pope was elected by the Favour of the Immortal Gods, Deorum immortalium beneficium? I take these Words from the Author of the Art of Thinking (3). Before him, Justus Lipsius had judiciously, and pleasantly, criticized Bembus's Latinity (4). He blames him, among other things, for having said, that the Senate of Venice wrote to the Pope; Put your Trust in the Immortal Gods, whose Vicar you are on Earth: — ut fidas Diis immortalibus, quorum vicem geris in terris. After this, we ought not to wonder, that he made use of the Word Goddess, speaking of the Holy Virgin. It is in a Letter (5), where Pope Leo X reproaches the Inhabitants of Recanati, for having given bad Timber for the Building of our Lady of centured by Lipſius, upon That Account. It has been alſo criticized by others, with reſpect to Sincerity (a). His Letters have not been more ſpared [C]. He began betimes to run the hazard of being an Author [D]; and he was very ſucceſſful in it; for his Azolari had an extraordinary Run (b). He was much taken notice of at the Courts of the Duke of Ferrara, and of the Duke of Urbino, which were then the moſt polite of That Country, and the Rendezvous of the fineſt Wits (c). He publickly teſtified his Gratitude for the Eſteem, with which the Duke and Ducheſs of Urbino honoured him, for he wrote a Book in their Praise (d). He was a good Italian, and Latin, Poet; but he was juſtly centured for having publiſhed ſome looſe and obſcene Poems [E]. He is one of Thoſe, who have been accuſed of having ſpoken

The Words, which Chriſtianity has conſecrated, as, fides, excommunication, ſeem barbarous to This Writer; he chooſes rather to make uſe of perſuaſio for fides, and of aqua & igni interdictio for excommunication. Lipſius finds ſome other Faults in him, as ſome Italicisms, and alſo ſome Solecisms. The ſame Lipſius, in his Notes on the ninth Chapter of the firſt Book of his Politics, comprehends, in a few Words, what he had more amply ſhewed in the above-cited Letter. Among other things, he ſays; “Cum tam curioſe à verbis ſibi caverit, repetitio alibi, quæ non dicam Tulliana non ſunt, ſed vix Latina. — Notwithſtanding his great Care in the Choice of his Words, I meet with ſome, which are not only not Ciceronian, but ſcarce Latin.” The Phraſe aſſerre nuove, which he criticizes, would be more pardonable in a Dutchman, becauſe the ſame Word in Dutch, which ſignifies to bring, ſignifies alſo to carry, which creates ſometimes very pleaſant Expreſſions from Dutchmen, who begin to ſpeak French. The Hiſtory of Venice, which Lipſius criticized ſo much as to the Style, appeared, to our Mr Balzac, the Work of a mean Wit, and of a dry and grovelling Author (6).

[C] His Letters have not been more ſpared. His Friends have been challenged to ſhew any one of them, that do not groſſly trepaſs againſt Grammar, and that is not remarkable for ſome egregious Childiſhneſs, and moreover without any Solidity. “Ut cæterum carminum ejus obſcenitatem taceam, quid ejus epistolæ ineptius, & quidem illis quas Pontificis maximi nomine & de rebus maximis ſcripſit, & ad viros maximos? Mentiar ego cum Scipione Gentili *, & luam gravi poena, ſi vel unam mihi in tot illis voluminibus Epistolam offendant amatores ejus, quæ non inſigni aliquo vitio Grammatico laboret, aut puerili aliqua ineptia conſpicua ſit & demonſtrabiliſ. Ne quid de rebus ipſis atque ſcientiis dicam ſipientie inaniffimis, & mire languidiſ, & (repetendum eſt enim, quod ejus proprium maxime eſt) ineptiſ (7). — To ſay nothing of the other Objections to be met with in his Verſes, what can be more trifling, than his Letters, even Thoſe, which he wrote, in the Pope's Name, on Affairs of the greateſt Importance, and to the greateſt Men? Let me paſs for a Liar with Scipio Gentilis, and ſuffer great Punishment, if his Fanciers can ſhew me but one Letter in ſo many Volumes, which does not ſomewhere remarkably offend againſt Grammar, or is not conſpicuous for ſome childiſh Impertinence. I ſay nothing of the Subject Matter of them, and That ſurprizing Emptineſs, and (I muſt again repeat it, as being peculiar to him) That Impertinence.”

[D] He ventured betimes to run the Hazard of being an Author. During the three Years (8) he was in Sicily, a Scholar of Conſtantine Laſcaris, Profeſſor of the Greek Tongue, at Mefſina, he compoſed a Latin Treatiſe de Monte Ætna, which was printed in 1485 (9). Being returned home to his Father, he followed him ſome Years after to the Court of Heracles d'Ef, Duke of Ferrara. He made himſelf beloved, and reſpected, there; and it was at this time, that he wrote his Azolari. They are Diſcourſes on Love, ſo called, becauſe it is ſuppoſed, that they were made in the Caſtle of Azolo. He was, then, but twenty ſix Years of Age (10). This Italian Book had great Succeſs, both among Men and Women; one would have paſt for a Novice in Italy, who ſhould have been a Stranger to it. “Eos libros tanta hominum, mulierum etiam, medius fidius, approbatione, & tanquam plauiſu exceptos recentes eſſe meminimus, ut exemplo cuncta eos Italia cupidiffimè læſtitur, atque didicerit: ut non ſatis urbani aut elegantes eſſi haberentur, quibus Aſulanæ illæ diſputationes eſſent incognitæ (11).” It has been printed ſeveral Times. One John Martin, Secretary to Cardinal de Lenoncourt, made a French Tranſlation of it, which he publiſhed in the Year 1545.

He tranſlated it from the Italian Edition of the Year 1540, which had been preceded by three or four others, ſince That of the Year 1515; and he obſerves this, to prevent any Perſon from wondering at the Differences, which were between his Tranſlation, and the Original, printed by Aldus, in the Year 1515 (12). “If they pleaſe to conſider, ſays he (13), that Bembo's Work has been three or four times reprinted ſince That Time, and that the ſaid Signior Bembo has cut off ſome things from it, which ſeemed ſuperfluous to him, and alſo that the laſt Impreſſion (which I have followed,) is of the Year 1540, made, (as it is to be ſuppoſed) by his Authority, and Permiſſion; my Opinion is, that they will not ſay, that I have wronged the Author in any thing.” This was of ſome uſe to Gaffarel, who, finding himſelf centured for employing his Pen in Matters ill-becoming a Clergyman, excuſed himſelf by the Authority of divers Examples; and by name, That of the Azolari of Cardinal Bembo (14). It might have been objected to him, that That Work was compoſed by a young Gentleman, who was not yet engaged in the Eccleſiaſtical State: but he might have replied, that the Author publiſhed a new Edition of it, after his Cardinalſhip.

[E] He has been centured for having publiſhed ſome looſe and obſcene Poems. We have ſeen already (15), what Lanzius reproaches him with; here is a Paſſage of Scaliger: “Petrus Bembo elegiaco (carmine) eam partem corporis hominis celebravit, ſine qua nulla obſcenitas foret. Legatur ejus Elegia, cujus initium:

Of all the Plants, which in my Garden grow,
This moſt the Female Touch deſires to know.

“which Poem may deſervedly be called The Moſt Obſcene Elegance, or The Moſt Elegant Obſcenity. It conſiſts of Forty one Diſtichs. Tibullus and Ménage, ſhall ſerve as new Witneſſes; the former by theſe Words; “Illius (Bembi) multa licentioſius, ut temporum nequitia & domini cui ſerviebat mores ſerebant, ſcripta extant (17); — — — — — There are extant ſeveral looſe Compoſitions of the ſame Bembo, which are owing to the Vice of the Times, and the Manners of the Maſter, whom he ſerved.” And the latter by this Remark: “If it was true, that John della Caſa was excluded from the Cardinalſhip for his Poem, Cardinal Bembo was more fortunate than He; for the licentious Verſes, which he wrote in his Youth, and which are yet more licentious than Thoſe of the Capitolo del Furno, did not hinder him from being made a Cardinal (18).”

[F] ----- and for having spoken of the Word of God with great Contempt.] I can go back no farther, than a German Author, whose Name is Thomas Lanzius, who published several Speeches, for, and against, the Nations of Europe. He says, without quoting any Body (19), that Bembus advised a Friend not to read St Paul's Epistles, for fear of spoiling his Style. "Advertite, auditores, inepti hominis impie-

"tatem cum pari stultitia conjunctam. Is siquidem
"Epistolae omnes Pauli palam condemnavit, easque
"deflexo in contumeliam vocabulo Epistolaeas est
"ausus appellare, cum amico autor esset ne illas attingeret, vel, si cepisset legere, de manibus ejiceret, si elegantiam scribendi & eloquentiam adamaret (20).
"----- Observe, Gentlemen, the equal Impiety and
"Folly of the Man. He openly condemned All St Paul's "Epistles, and contemptuously dared to stile them Epi"stoles, advising a Friend not to meddle with them,
"or, if he should begin to read them, presently to "throw them by, if he loved Elegance of Style, and "Eloquence." Others pretend, that, having heard, that Sadolet explained the Epistle to the Romans, he said to him; Let these Fooleries alone, they do not become a grave Man: Omitte has nugas, non enim de-cent gravem virum tales ineptiae (21). We shall see, in another place (22) a Story, which was spread abroad, which would induce one to think, that he did not believe the Immortality of the Soul.

[G] Authors differ about the Sex of his Children.] Moreri gives him two Sons and a Daughter; but Imperialis observes, that Bembus kept a Concubine all his Life-time, by whom he had three Daughters (23). It is certain, that Bembus had a Son, whose Name was Torquato, to whom Manutius dedicated his Virgil. I do not question but that Imperialis is mistaken; for John della Cafa, who wrote the Life of Bembus with great Application, says expressly, that his Mistress had two Sons by him, to wit, Lucilio and Torquato, and a Daughter, whose Name was Helena, who was married to Peter Gradenigue. He remarks also, that This Mistress was a fine Woman, and that Peter Bembus, a well-shaped, polite, gallant, and courteous Man, was greatly beloved in all Companies. During his Abode at Ferrara, Duke Hercules d'Este, and Lucretia Borgia, the Wife of Alphonfus d'Este, shewed him a particular Friendship (24).

[H] One of his Letters informs us, that his two Grandmothers lived a hundred Years.] This Letter being short, I shall set it down at length (25): It appears by it, that Bembus would willingly have sacrificed these two old Women to the Life of his deceased Brother. "Petrus Bembus Herculi Strotio. Avias am-bas meae effraetas, deplorataeque feminas, & jam pro-pe centum annorum mulieres, mihi fata reliquerunt: unicum fratrem meum juvenem ac florentem abstulerunt, spem & solatia mea. Quamobrem quo in mœrore sim iple facile potes existimare. Reliqua ex meis intelliges. Heu me miserum! Vale. Id. Jan. 1504. Venetiis. ----- Peter Bembo to Hercules Strozza. Fate has left me both my Grandmothers, wretched old Women, and now almost an hundred Years old: but it has robbed me of my only Brother, in the Flower of his Youth, my Hope and Consolation. You may, from hence, easily guess at my Affliction. The Rest my People will inform you of. Farewel. Venice. The Ides of January, 1504." He was much more affected with his Mother's Death. See the Remark [K].

[I] He set a great Value on the Knowledge of Languages.] So far as to prefer it before the Marquise of Mantua. "Jo fo nulla per rispetto à que gloriosi: ma quel poco che io ne fo delle lingue, non lo cangiarei al Marchesato di Mantova (26). ----- I am "not vain of my Knowledge in any Language; but the "little I know of them I would not exchange for the

"Marquise of Mantua." A Writer of Dialogues makes no scruple to ascribe to his Interlocutors, what they never said; and therefore I see no great reason to believe, that Peter Bembo was really of This Opinion, having no other Proof for it, than This Author's Dialogue. Some have quoted Speron Sperone, as if Bembus had only mentioned his Talent of writing in Latin (27); but it is certain, from the Words that I have cited, that Bembus spoke, in general, of the Knowledge of Tongues: And it must not be imagined, that he pretended to exclude the Greek, which he had learned in Sicily under Lascaris, so far as to write it very well (28).

[K] His Mother had lived Forty eight Years with her Husband, in a Concord, which no Complaint had ever interrupted.] These are his Words: "Cum duce-
"essent causae quibus maxime commoveri debui ad
"luctum, una quod me parente optima meique a-"mantissima orbatum viderem; altera, quod te pri"vari lectissima prudentissimae conjuge, cum qua
"duodequingenta annos SINE ULLA QUERELA
"concordissime vixissem, tibi patri meo acerbissimum
"atque luctuosissimum putarem futurum; harum
"duarum causarum altera me abs te levavi sentie-
"bam, &c (29). ----- Tho' I have two Reasons to "be afflicted; the One, The Loss of the best and "fondest of Mothers; the Other, The extrem Con"cern, which must affect you, O my Father, at being "deprived of the choicest and most prudent of Wives,
"with whom you have lived Forty eight Years, in
"the utmost Concord; yet you yourself afford me Re"lief from one of these Occasions of Sorrow, &c." This Letter, dated from Urbino, the Twenty second of November, 1509, is a great Elogy of the Mother, and an illustrious Testimony of her Son's Affection. It deserves to be read from the beginning to the end. Bernard Bembo had already some Grandsons. His Wife had lived near seventy Years. There is another Letter of Peter Bembo, wherein he shews his Brotherly Affection; for he gives there a lively Representation of his Sister's Unhappiness, that he might obtain some Remedy for That Lady's Misfortunes from the Patriarch of Venice. She was married to a Man, who gave himself over to all manner of Lewdness, and who bestowed that Affection, which was due to his Wife, on Prostitutes. "Mar-cellus ejus mariti meretricio amore animus turpiter "abalienatus (30). De Marcello etiam spero fore
"ut cum se ille meretricia consuetudine plena in"famiae, plena calamitatis, liberatum per te solum-

"vitam rationemque traduxeris (31). ----- As for "Marcellus, I am in hopes, that, when he comes "seriously to reflect, that you have freed him from the "Infamy and Danger of a Life spent among Harlots,
"he will return you thanks for bringing him over
"from a brutal, shameless, and irregular, Conduct,
"to the Life and Reason of a Man." He abused her horribly, without being moved to pity by her Pa-tience, and Silence, and by that Modesty, whereby she endeavoured to bring him back to his Duty. "Nolo tibi commemorare quot aut quantas indig-nitates Antonia foror univerfium biennium pertu-

He was blamed for having followed the Custom of Flatterers, with whom the Merit of the living always exceeds That of the dead; for he published, that Paul III. was more learned, than Leo X. It is worth while to see how he justified himself [L]. After the Death of Navagier, in 1530, the Council of Ten pitched upon Him to write The History of the Republic of Venice (g) [M]. His Age of sixty Years would have made him decline This Trouble, had he not been more willing to incommode himself, than not to do this Service to his Country (b). I must say a Word of the Design, it is pretended he had, to refuse the Cardinalship [N]. His Historian enlarged on this Point, and did not fail to say, that his Narrative would pass for a Fable, with many Persons, who judge of their Neighbours by themselves. He has nobly expressed This Common-place [O], as will be seen below (t); and I shall examine it more at large, in the last Remark of this Article.

It were to be wished, that so many Letters of great Men were not wrong dated (34).

[L] It is worth while to see how he justified himself from the Charge of Flattery. When, in 1535, he published the Letters, which he had written in the Name of Leo X. he dedicated them to Paul III. and declared him much more learned, than Pope Leo X. was. "Eas autem ad te, Paule, potissimum literas mitto; quia Pontifex maximus es, ut Leo decimus fuit, & in optimarum artium disciplinis multo, quam ille, habitus doctior. Vera enim fateri omnes non solum honeste possumus, sed etiam debemus. --- I, therefore, dedicate these Letters to you, Paul, because you are Pope, as was Leo X., and esteemed more learned, than He. For we not only may, but ought, to confess the Truth." This Elogy was looked upon as exorbitant; Bembus's Character, and the Remembrance of the great Favours he had received from Leo X. were not to be seen in it. "Esse nonnullos, qui me in laudando Paulo Pont. Max. longius progressum esse putent, quam aut mei mores, aut summa in me Leonis X. officia, aut veritas omnino ipsa postularit (35). --- *Some there are, who think I have gone farther in commending Pope Paul, than my own Character, or the Favours I received from Leo X., or than even Truth itself demands.*" He answered Musini, who gave him Notice of This Censure, That he had only given the Preference to Paul III. as to Literature, which the Domestic Misfortunes of Leo X. had hindered him from making any great Progress in; that he had taken care not to judge which of the two surpassed the other in Prudence, Firmness, Temperance, Goodness, and Liberality; that it was not difficult to know, that Paul had more Learning, than the other; that he had never failed to acknowledge the Favours of Leo X. though he was less indebted to him for his Fortune, than to Julius II. "Tamen si mediam plus partem earum quas habeo fortunarum omnium Julius secundus Pont. Max. cui nunquam interfui, contulit (36). --- *Tho' Pope Julius II. whom I never served, conferred on me more than half the Fortunes I possess.*"

(36) About the Year

(37) Bembus, init. Histor. Perum Venetar.

[M] He was pitched upon to write the History of the Republic of Venice. They would have him to begin it, where Sabellicus had ended it (37), and continue it down to his own time. This Interval comprehended Forty four Years (38). He did not complete it; for he ended his Work at the Death of Julius II. This History is divided into twelve Books, and was printed at Venice, in the Year 1551, and reprinted, the same Year, at Paris, by Michael Vascijon, in 4to. It was afterwards printed at Basil, with the other Works of Bembus, in three Volumes, in 8vo, in the Year 1567. Neither He, nor any one else, could reap any Benefit from Andrew Navagier's Labour, who had a like Commission, and who, at his Death, had ordered all his Writings to be burnt (39). We have seen, in the Remark [B], what Judgment was passed on the History written by Bembus.

[N] It is pretended, he had a Design to refuse the Cardinalship. Moreri speaks of it at large; but he has not discovered the Beauties, with which John della Casa, whom he copies, has adorned That Narrative. This Historian of our Bembus declares, he is not ignorant, that several People will reject this Part of his Narrative; and That, since most Men judge of others by themselves, it will not be believed, that Peter Bembus sincerely despised a Degree of Honour, which almost every one judges to deserve the most passionate and earnest Wishes; but that, as for himself, who writes, whilst things are yet fresh in Memory, and whilst part of the Actors are yet living, he ought not to be suspected of an Imposture; but that, after all, he is not afraid of the Appearances of Falshood, which attended the Truth he was about to publish, remembering very well, that the Fault of Those, who venture to advance Untruths in History, is as great, as the Fault of Those, who dare not speak out the Truth. I do not represent the Beauties of the Original, any more than Moreri; and therefore I shall set down the Author's own Words for the sake of those, who understand Latin. "Non sum nescius multo fore, qui nostræ orationi hac in re parum fidei habeant: plerique enim omnes, quid de aliena voluntate credendum sit, de sua conjecturam faciunt: itaque incredibile multis visum iri intelligo, Bembum id verè atque ex animo aspernatum esse, quod omnes fere summa cupiditate expetendum atque optabile esse existimant; tamen si scribimus hæc recentii hujus facti memoria, multique, qui in agendo adfuerunt, superflitibus, quos mendacii atque impudentie nostræ conficiat ac testes habere cur velimus causa nulla est. Sed quoniam par eorum peccatum esse censemus, qui mentiri in historia audent, atque eorum, qui dicere verum reformidant; mendacii speciem, verum cum dicturi essemus, non horruimus (40)." I find myself obliged to say here, that I am none of Those, of whom John della Casa foresaw the Incredulity. I have seen so many Characters in Peter Bembus's Letters, not only of an honest Man, and a generous and assiduous Friend, but also of a learned Person, who preferred the Calmness of a retired Life, which permits an entire Consecration to the Muses, before the Vanities and Poms of a Court, that I can easily imagine, he wished in earnest not to be a Cardinal.

[O] His Historian says, that this will pass for a Fable with Those, who judge of their Neighbours by themselves; and he has nobly expressed This Common-place. It is what we have seen in his Latin Words; and, consequently, there remains only for me to prove, that there is a Common-place in them; which I shall easily do. One of the Difficulties, which attend the writing of History, is, that the Readers are apt to look upon the noblest Actions, of which they find themselves incapable, as too many Lies: This has been observed long ago. "Ac mihi quidem, said Sal- lust (41), ----- in primis arduum videtur, res gestas scribere; primum, quod facta dictis exæquanda sunt; dehinc, quia plerique, quæ delicta reprehenderis, malevolentia & invidia dicta putant, ubi de magna virtute, atque gloria bonorum mores, quæ sibi quicque facilia facta putat, æquo animo accipit, supra, veluti dicta, pro falsis ducit. ----- For my own Part, I look upon the writing of History to be the most difficult Task; first, because the Actions and Style must correspond; then, because pested the Falsity of the History, which we read in the eighth Chapter of St John, is, because it is said there, that JESUS CHRIST remained alone with the Woman, who was accused of Adultery (54). "Talis Beza, qui in octavum caput Johannis affirmat, sibi mulieris in adulterio deprehensæ historiam sul- peclæ fidei ac veritatis esse, quod CHRISTUS dica- tur solus cum sola fœmina remansisse: sibi nempe conficius, quid solus ipse cum Candida sua sola agere confueverit: qui, sicut Spartani, quod Martiales ac bellatores essent, omnes Deorum dearumque imagi- nes atque statuas hastatas faciebant, tamquam Deos omnes virtute bellica præditos existimarent; ita ipse propter suam libidinem & impudicitiam, CHRIS- TUM quoque Sanctum Sanctorum, &c (55). ---- Such is Beza, who, on the eighth Chapter of St John, affirms, that he suspects the Truth of the Story of the Woman taken in Adultery, because

"CHRIST is said to have been left alone with the Woman: being conscious to himself of what was went to pass between him and his Candida, when alone together: And, as the Spartans, worshippers of Mars, and Warriors, made the Statues of all their Deities armed with Spears; so this Man, being himself libidinous and unmodest, suspects CHRIST, the Holy of Holies, &c." Never was Satire so ill grounded as This; for it is true, indeed, that the History of This Woman was suspected by Beza; but it is no ways for the reason, which Scio pius alleges: Beza gives several reasons for it; and, if he observes, that JESUS CHRIST was left alone with The Woman, it is not because such a Circumstance contains a Motive of some dishonest Suspicion, but because the thing itself does not agree with the Sequel of the Text, and does not seem probable (56).

BEME, Murtherer of Admiral de Chatillon, on St Bartholomew's Day, would not deserve a Place in This Dictionary, were it not, that many Persons, knowing a Man by some very enormous Crime, desire to know what became of him afterwards, and of what manner of Death he died. Now they cannot well satisfy their Curiosity, without much Trouble, when the Person in question is of mean Rank; wherefore, it must be a great Pleasure to them, when a Book is put into their Hands, whereby they are enabled to satisfy themselves immediately. Let thus much be said, once for all, in regard to such like Articles. BEME, then, a German by Nation [A], educated in the House of the Duke of Guise, made himself the chief Executioner of the Massacre, which was resolved upon against the Admiral (a). It was Beme, who, as soon as the Chamber Door was broke open, asked him, Art thou the Admiral? And, knowing by his Answer what he had asked, he run his Sword through his Body, and then gave him a great cut, with his Back-sword, over his Face. It was He, who answered the Duke of Guise, enquiring If the Business was done, that it was done, and who threw the Body, by the Duke's Order, out of the Window. He was taken in Xaintonge, by the Garrison of Bouteville, in the Year 1575. He promised a great Ranfom, and to cause Montbrun to be released, whom the Catholics had taken in Dauphiné. The Desire alone of saving Montbrun, kept Beme from being put to Death; wherefore he was in great fear, when he heard, that Montbrun was executed; He bribed a Soldier, who saved him on a good Horse, with a Pistol at his Saddle Bow. Bertanville, Governor of the Place, finding, that he was escaped, mounts on a cropt Horse alone, and overtakes Beme, and the Soldier; and, having no other Weapon but a Sword, makes at both of them; the Soldier would not wait for him; but Beme cried out to him, Thou knowest that I am a dangerous Fellow, and fired his Pistol; the other, answering, I will not suffer thee to be so any longer, thrust his Sword up to the Hilt into his Prisoner's Belly. Thus d'Aubigné relates the Fact (b). Beza says much the same (c) [B]; but we shall see below, that Thuanus relates the Matter with other Circumstances [C]. Mezerai calls This Murtherer N. Dianovitz- Befme (d).

(4) He should have said Xaintonge.

[A] He was a German by Nation. He was born in the Country of Wurtemberg, and it is said, he was the Son of One, who had been intrusted with the Artillery (1). The Author of the Book, de furoribus Gallicis (2), observes, that it was said, that the Cardinal of Lorraine had married one of his Bastards to Beme. He calls him always Benfius: It is probably a Fault of the Printer for Benefius. Cavriana, whom I shall quote below, says, that This Person had been Page to the Duke of Guise, the Father.

[B] He was slain by Bertanville ----- Beza says much the same.] Let us relate what he says; for it contains some other Circumstances. Speaking of the Defeat of the Reiters (3), commanded by Thoré, Son of the Constable Anne de Montmorency, he says, that Clermont was taken Prisoner there; "And had it not been for the Credit of divers Lords his Relations (and because, about the same, Bejme, one of the chief Murtherers of the Admiral, as well for That, as for other Reasons greatly beloved by the Duke of Guise, had been taken by Those of the Reformed Religion near Ponts in Poitou) (4) he would hardly have saved his Life. ---- Some time after, he was conducted to Paris, and much carried about, to try if they could exchange him for Beme; but, though he was in very great Danger of his Life, being desired to agree to That Exchange, he generously answered, that he would never consent to be exchanged for such a detestable Murtherer; and God favoured him so much, that, having been put to ranfom ----- he was at last set at liberty, and Beme, thinking to make his Escape from the Castle, where he was a Prisoner, was retaken, and cut in pieces, as he deserved, except that it was not done by the Hands of a Common Executioner (5)." Cavriana, having said, in his Discourses on Tacitus, that Beme shot the Admiral with a Pistol, adds that This Murtherer was killed in the same manner, some time after, as he was returning from Spain. Fu pochi anni dopo venendo d'España con somigliante specie di morte del suo fatto premiato. This Account is not so clear, and so particular, as it should be; but some other Writers have cleared up the Matter.

[C] Thuanus relates the Matter with other Circumstances. He says, that Beme, returning from Spain, whither the Duke of Guise had sent him to buy Horses, or, under That Pretence, to renew the Correspondence, which the late Cardinal of Lorraine had kept up with Philip II., was taken near Jarnac; that he offered his good Offices to release Montbrun, and a very considerable Sum; but that his Proposals were not regarded, and that, on the contrary, Those, who had taken him, solicited the Robellers to buy him of them for a thousand Pistoles, and afterwards to punish him with the utmost Severity for the infamous Murther of the Admiral; that the Robellers, for fear of reprisals, and by the Counsel of la Nouë, rejected these Offers; that Bretouville, Governor of Bouteville, being unwilling to ranfom such a Prisoner, and fearing, that, if he should put him to Death, he would set an example, which might be attended with ill Consequences, found out an expedient; which was to suborn a Soldier to supply Beme with the the means to escape. This Soldier, and Beme, made their Escape accordingly; but they fell into the Ambuscades, which Bertanville had laid for them, and Beme was killed with several Stabs (6). Mezerai relates the Matter much in the same manner (7): He says, that the Confistory of Rochel would have given a thousand Crowns for That Prisoner, to have punished him publicly; but the Wife's, and Bertanville (8) Gouverneur of the Place (9), apprehended a Retaliation.

Peter de St Romuald says, "that the Rochellers desired to have Beme, at the Persuasion of la Nouë, who would have put him to a severe and shameful Death; and that Beme, being mortally wounded by Bertanville, and afterwards killed by the Soldiers, was, at last, sent to the Baron de Ruffec, at his great Solicitation, who caused him to be honourably buried at Engolme; and that the Soldier, who had endeavoured to favour his Escape, being grievously wounded, came off with a Ranfom, and was banished the Place (10)."

BENCIUS (FRANCIS), an Italian Jesuit, was born at Aquapendente, in the Year 1542 [A]. He studied the Belles Lettres at Rome, under Marc Antony Muretus, and made so happy a Progress under the Lectures of this Great Rhetorician, that he became one of the most excellent Orators of That Time. He was likewise a very good Latin Poet. There is something very surprizing in the Manner, in which it is said he came to a Resolution of taking the Habit of a Jesuit [B]. He taught Rhetoric for many Years, at Rome, in the College of the Society, and died there, the sixth of May, 1594 (a). He had three Brothers, who were likewise Jesuits (b): His Father was yet alive in the Year 1590 (c). You will find, in Moreri, the Titles of some of his Works; I shall confine myself to his Speeches [C].

(c) See the Epistle Dedicatory of the Poems of Bencius.

[A] He was born at Aquapendente in the Year 1542. The Elegies, extracted from Thuanus by Mr Teiffier, inform us, that Bencius was born in a Village of Tuscany, called Aquapendente, which was the Patrimony of his Father (1). The Latin Words of Thuanus are, Patrimoniali Etruriae oppido, cui Aquapendenti nomen, natus (2). The Word oppidum being equivocal, and signifying sometimes a Borough, sometimes a Town, it must not here be taken for a Village, but a Town. I know not whether Thuanus had reason to say, that the Father of Bencius was Lord of it. Alegambus says no such thing; and it is not usual with That Author to suppress what may enhance the Birth and Riches of the Writers of his Order.

(1) Teiffier's Elegies, Tom. II, p. 206, Edit. of 1696.

(2) Thuanus, Histor. lib. cix, p. 612.

I have two reasons for fixing the Birth of Bencius to the Year 1542; the one is, that he died in the Year 1594: This is attended with no difficulty; the other is, that we find in Alegambus, that he died in the Fifty second Year of his Age. Alegambus is a little confused in his Figures; however I was of Opinion there was no Error in This; but I am surprized, that, in making The Errata of his Work, he did not rectify the following. Annos natus xx, in Societatem est accessit, xv Cal. Junii, anno Christi MD.LXX (3). — Anno Salutis MD.XCIV, migravit e vita, aetatis suae LII, postquam venit in Societatem xxvii (4). He says, that Bencius, having become a Jesuit in 1570, at the Age of twenty Years, was in the Fifty second Year of his Life, and Twenty seventh of his Profession, in 1594. These Computations destroy each other. Nicinus Erythraeus is more consistent; for, having once said, that Bencius became a Jesuit at the Age of twenty Years, he allows him Fifty two Years of Life, and Thirty two of Jesuitism (5).

(3) Alegambus, Bibl. Societ. Jesu, pag. 114.

(4) Ibid. pag. 115.

(5) Nic. Erythr. Pina-coth. II, pag. 115.

[B] There is something very surprizing in the manner of his coming to a Resolution of taking the Habit of a Jesuit. They, who would read the Particulars of this Adventure, may consult Alegambus, and Nicinus Erythraeus. They will there read of nocturnal Apparitions, of a Crucifix, and many other things. I shall only observe, that Nicinus Erythraeus goes farther, than the other Author. The latter is satisfied with telling us, that, from the time Bencius first confessed himself, which was to some of the Jesuits, he took it into his Head, that he should one Day be of their Order (6): but, according to Nicinus Erythraeus, he thought he heard, during his Confession in the Church of the Jesuits, a Voice, which pronounced these Words; You shall also be, one Day, of the Number of these Religious (7): Alegambus, as I have already observed, does not extenuate what advances the Credit of his Society. It is probable, therefore, Nicinus Erythraeus has here expressed himself hyperbolically: the Fact, in passing from Mouth to Mouth, was exaggerated before it reached the Ears of This Writer.

(7) Vides est vocem in hac verba audire. Et tu quae aliquando Religiosorum istam numerum augere. Nic. Erythr. Pina-coth. II, pag. 115.

[C] I shall confine myself to his Speeches. Some of them were printed separately; and Manuscript Copies of others were handed about. These Copies became imperfect, in proportion as they multiplied. This made the Author resolve to publish an Edition of his Speeches in 1590 (8). He dedicated it to Cardinal Africanio Colonna. He published likewise the same Year a Collection of Latin Poems, and dedicated it to Cardinal Francis Sforza. His Speeches, to the Number of Twenty six, are accompanied with a short Dissertation de Stylo & Scriptura, and contain, among other Pieces, the funeral Oration of Muretus, That of Alexander Farnese, Duke of Parma, and That of Cardinal Alexander Farnese. The Poems are divided into four Books. They were reprinted with the Speeches, at Ingolstadt, in the Year 1599; and there are added to them Two Dramatic Poems of the same Author (9), which had been published separately. The Edition of Cologne, for John Kinchius, in 1617, in 12mo, contains all This. It is pretty correct; but the Paper and Character are very bad. The Publisher has not added the Poem in Hexameter Verse, entitled, Quinque Martyres, or the five Martyrs, in which Bencius has celebrated the Martyrdom, which Five Jesuits suffered in the Indies, in 1583. This Work, divided into six Books, was printed at Venice, in the Year 1591, and dedicated by Benedictus Georgius to Cardinal Ottavio Acquaviva, Nephew of Claudius Acquaviva, General of the Jesuits. I have the Edition of Antwerp, in 1602, in 12mo. The Author sets off the Simplicity of History with Poetical Fictions, of which he gives the Reader notice: Si qua visa, & quae speciem habent miraculi, inserta sunt, factum est, ut Poeticum Artificium Historiae simplicitati mederetur. Relations in Prose have often need of the same Advertisment.

Mr Teiffier affirms, that Nicinus Erythraeus says, that This Jesuit translated Aristotle's Rhetoric so well, that it is difficult to find a more perfect Work of the Sort (10). I have not met with This in Erythraeus's Elogium of This Jesuit: I only find, that Muretus dedicated his Latin Version of Aristotle's Rhetoric to Bencius, and that the latter read Lectures on the same Work (11).

BENEDICTIS (ELPIDIO de), had a good Share in the Esteem and Affairs of Cardinal Mazarin. He was his Secretary during his Nunciature in France, and afterwards his Agent at Rome. He acquitted himself so well of That Employ, that the Cardinal praised his Fidelity and good Conduct, in his last Will, and recommended him to the Most Christian King. This Recommendation was not fruitless; for the Abbot Benedictis was declared Agent of France at Rome, and loaded with Riches. He was ordered, by the Cardinal's Heirs, to cause a sumptuous Funeral Service to be performed for him in the Church of St Vincent and St Anastasius, which had been his Eminence's Parish. He performed it admirably well, and published a Description of This Funeral Pomp (a). He was ordered to cause a Funeral Solemnity to be performed for the Queen-Mother (b), with all manner of Pomp, in the Church of St Lewis, which is That of the Nation; he performed it like a Man, who perfectly understood these sort of Ceremonies. The Description of These Funerals is to be seen in a Book, which he published (c). He wrote another, which is an authentic Monument of his Zeal for the Honour of his Benefactor; for, having been informed, that a Book was handed about, which strangely defamed Cardinal Mazarin, he published a Collection of divers Memoirs in Italian, which he thought proper to confute That Satire. He enlarged it soon after, and added some Political Reflexions to it. He translated the Treatise of the Prince of Conii, concerning the Duty of Great Men, into Italian. I ought not to forget the Chronological Tables, which he published. Those who have seen the House and Garden, which he caused to be built near Rome, or who have read the Description, which he gave of them, under the Title of Villa Beneditta Literaria, must grant, that he understood Architecture, and knew how to adorn and embellish a House. He is the Author of the Decorations, which are to be seen in a Chapel, dedicated to St Lewis, in the Church of the same Saint, which Chapel he caused to be built almost from the Foundation (d).

BENI (PAUL), Professor of Eloquence, in the University of Padua, from the Year 1599, till his Death, which happened in the Year 1625, was one of the most copious Writers, that flourished in his Time. He was a Greek by Nation [A], as it has been lately said; and was not born at Eugubio, in the Duchy of Urbino, as many Persons affirm. He lived a long time among the Jesuits; but he left their Society, because they would not permit him to publish a Commentary on Plato's Feast: The Obscenity of the Subject obliged them to refuse him the Permission he desired. The Reputation, which his Works procured him, moved the Senate of Venice to choose him to succeed Riccoboni, in the Chair of Eloquence; but he did not answer the Hopes, which were conceived of him. He tired his Auditors with long, wordy, Discourses, void of Matter, and pronounced in a languid manner, which, together with some other Reasons (a), and the pleasing manner, in which his Colleague, Vincent Contarini, delivered his Learning, made his Auditors desert so fast, that, sometimes, there were not so many Persons in his School, as are required for the signing of a Contract (b). This did not discourage him from his Study, nor lessen his extraordinary Application to his Books, and his Pen. One may easily be convinced of this, by the great number of Books, which he gave the Public, wherein there is, doubtless, a great deal of Learning and Wit. He singly maintained a Quarrel against the Academy della Crusca [B], with such Success, as rendered him formidable to many Authors [C]. The Respect, they have, at Padua, for the Memory of Livy, did not hinder our Paul Beni from attacking That Historian with the utmost Vigor (c). Consult Moreri's Dictionary; for I only mention what he has omitted.

[A] He was a Greek by Nation. I was surprized to find This affirmed in the History of the Works of the Learned (1), and, in order to know, which of the two said so, The Author of That Journal, or the Author of the Book, mentioned by Him, I consulted the Life of Tasso, and found these Words in it (2); "All the Learned Men in Italy ----- have followed Paul Beni's Opinion unanimously. That Learned Greek, transplanted into Italy, made it appear, in an elaborate Comparison of the Poems of Homer, Virgil, and Tasso, that the modern Poet had comprehended all the Beauties of the two Ancient in his Work, without imitating their Faults." I thought it was a Mistake; for I knew, that Tomasini, and Lorenzo Cressio, affirm, that he was born at Eugubio; and he calls himself Eugubinus, in the Titles of some of his Books, and in the Inscription, which he desired might be put on his Tomb; and, therefore, I followed This Opinion in the first Edition of This Dictionary. But I have been freed from my Error by the Abbot de Charnes, and That in such a Manner, as engages me to think myself happy in having said, that I esteemed and honoured him very much. He supplied me with a Passage, which does not permit me to doubt, that our Beni was born in Candia (3). It is true, He was but a Child, when he came into Italy.

[B] He singly maintained a Quarrel against the Academy della Crusca. Every Body knows, that the Italian Dictionary of That famous Academy of Florence, is a Work of great Importance; "Which was," doubtless, the reason, why, as soon as it appeared, "it met with almost as many Critics, as Readers." Among others, Beni did not cease to cry down "This Work, and to declaim against the Authors of it, as so many Monopolizers of the Italian Lan- guage: He undertook to make it appear, that they "had neither Ability, nor Authority, requisite to decide in such a Manner. The Book, which he published on That Account, was printed at Padua in the Year 1613, in Quarto, under the Title of Anti-Crusca, & vero, Il Paragone della Lingua Italiana, nel qual si mostra chiaramente que l'antica sia inculta e rozza, & la moderna regola, &c. (4). --- "The Gentlemen of the Academy chose to answer him with the Pen, instead of proceeding against him any other way. But, if we may believe Tomasini, This Method, which was, besides, the longest, and the most perplexing, did not succeed to their Honour. For it occasioned a furious Reply from Beni, who produced it as a Defence of the Anti-Crusca. He published it under the Title of Il Cavacanti, & vero, la Difesa del Paragone della Lingua Italiana, &c. (5). ----- The End of This Combat was so glorious for Beni (in the Opinion of Tomasini) that he obtained the Victory over all the Academy della Crusca, and was proclaimed Defender of the Italian Tongue (6). Let us see the Words of Tomasini. "Adversus Academicos Cruscantes, & Dictionarium Italicum ab iisdem editum, Anti-Cruscam condidit. Cui cum respondissent Academici, cumulate libro iisdem altero sub Cavalantis nomine satisfecit, seque à variis eorumdem jurgiis valide adeo vindicavit, ut toto orbi clarissimus acerrimusque Italicus Idiomatis Defensor fuerit acclamatus (7)." It is said, that he obtained as great a Victory over These Gentlemen some time after, in defending Tasso against their Censures (8).

[C] --- which rendered him very formidable to many Authors. He was summoned to appear at Rome, on the Account of the Book, he published, on the Affairs of Auxiliis, without knowing them. "What he suffered

BENNON, Bishop of Misnia or Meissen, in Germany, in the XIth Century, was canonized by Hadrian VI. The Bull of the Canonization, dated the Thirty first of May, 1523 [A], grounds Bennon's Merit, I. On his having been the only Bishop of Germany, who was true to the Court of Rome, in the Quarrels between Gregory VII. and the Emperor Henry IV. II. On the Miracles, which he had performed [B] in his Life-time, and after his Death. This Canonization had been a long time solicited at Rome, and perhaps had never been obtained, if Luther had not shaken off the Pope's Yoke, in the same Country, where the Body of Bennon lay: But the Court of Rome, thinking, that the Institution of a new Saint, would support the staggering Faith of That Country, yielded, at last, to the Instances of the Bishop of Meissen, who went to the Pope with powerful Recommendations from Charles V. the Archbishops of Magdeburg, and Salzburg, and the Marquisses of Misnia. Luther was not silent on this Occasion; but published a Treatise in Higb-Dutch, which he entituled, Against the new Idol, and old Demon, of Meissen. Emser wrote sharply against This Treatise of Luther, and boasted insultingly, that, notwithstanding the Invectives of This Enemy of the Church, a wonderful Concourse of People had assisted at the Ceremonies of This new Solemnity; and he prefaged, that it would continue for ever. His Prediction was soon convicted of Falshood [C]; That of Bennon was confuted at the same Time (a) [D]. Emser thought himself particularly obliged to write, upon this Occasion, against Luther; for he had published the Life of Bennon, in the Year 1512; wherein, among other things, he alledged divers Reasons, why the Bull of Canonization had not been yet obtained, after so much Expence, and so many Solicitations (b). There is a strange Mistake in Moreri's Dictionary (c).

(a) Taken out of Seckendorf's History of Lutheranism, lib. i, pag. 285.

(b) Ex eodem Seckendorf's Historio, lib. pag. 286, in Additione.

(c) See Remark [A].

[A] Dated the Thirty first of May 1523.] We find the same Date in Moreri's Dictionary. And That is not wrong. But we find there also, that Pope Adrian IV. dispatched This Bull; which is an unpardonable Falsity. Adrian IV. lived in the XIIIth Century.

[B] Grounds his Merit on some Miracles, which he performed.] The chief of them are; I. That the Keys of his Cathedral, which he had thrown into the River Elbe, after he had shut up That Church against the Emperor and his Embassadors, were found in the Belly of a Fish, and carried back to the Prelate. II. That he passed over the Elbe dry-shod. III. That he turned Water into Wine. IV. That, with a kick of his Foot, he caused a Fountain to spring up; and this is sufficient ground for the Church of Rome to boast, that the Fable of Pygmalion has had it's Accomplishment among the Christians. V. That he celebrated Mass in two places at one and the same time. VI. That, after his Death, he came, in a Dream, and add put out an Eye of William Marquis of Misnia (1). One may easily guess, that Luther did not spare These Miracles.

(1) Apud Seckendorf. Histor. Luther. lib. i, pag. 285.

[C] Emser's Prediction was soon convicted of Falshood.] The Inspectors, or Visitors, who were sent into Misnia in the Year 1539, having notified to the Country Priests, that they should conform themselves to the Confession of Augsburg, went, soon after, to exhort the Canons of the Cathedral Church of Meissen to do the same. Their Dean, Julius Pfug, having convened the Chapter, it was resolved, to leave Matters as they stood. Whereupon, they were enjoined not to perform any Act of Religion in the Church, according to the ancient Ritual; and Bennon's Tomb was demolished, as an Object of Baalitic Idolatry (2). Behold, then, a Worship, which, instead of being eternal, as Emser had prognosticated, was but of fifteen Years continuance. A wise Man ought to be extremely reserved concerning future Events, even when Appearances are favourable; and I think those are to be pitied, whose Profession requires, that they should keep up the Hopes of the People; for very often they are obliged to make Almanacks against their Knowledge.

[D] The Prediction of Bennon was confuted at the same time.] His Life says, That he declared, when he was dying, that he had obtained, by his Prayers, that the Worship, established in his Cathedral, should never cease. In eo tamen maxime falsum esse apparet, quod, teste Emsero, moriturus dixerit, precibus suis effectum esse, ut cultus Ecclesie Misnensis perpetuus sit futurus (3). This Worship was singular, and was not to be seen at Rome itself. The Intervals of the Psalmody were so contrived, in the Cathedral of Meissen, that, every Hour of the Day and Night, they sung the Praises of the Cœlestial Court. Ut nullum diei aut noctis tempus cantu & Deorum hymnis ac laudibus vacet (4). Bennon died like a false Prophet, if he declared, when he was dying, that this would always continue.

BENSERADE (a) (ISAAC de), one of the finest Wits of the XVIIth Century, was of Lions, near Roan (b). He was born a Protestant, as appears by his Christian Name; but was not bred in That Religion; for he was but a Child, when his Father turned Catholic. The Reason why the Bishop, who confirmed him, did not take from him the Name of Isaac, is very singular [A]. It is said, that his Ancestors were very considerable [B]; but every one does not agree to This. When his

(a) Thus he spelt his Name in a Letter, which he did me the honour to write to me, the 18th of May, 1685. I found Benserade at the end of the Epistle Dedicatory of the Paraphrase on the nine Lessons of Job. The Abbot Tallemant calls him also as Benserade.

(b) Dictionnaire de la Vie de Mr. Benserade, before his Panegyric; Edit. of Paris, 1667, and of Holland, 1698. Tallemant's the Author of That Disc.

[A] The Reason why the Bishop ----- did not take from him the Name of Isaac, is very singular.] Benserade was but seven or eight Years of Age, when the Bishop, who confirmed him, asked him, If he would have his Jewish Name changed for a more Christian one? With all my Heart, answered he, provided you will give me something to boot. The Prelate, surprized with the Child's Wit, would not change his Name, but said, We must leave it him; he will make it very illustrious. This Particular has been communicated to me by a good Hand; and I think it will be found in the Life of Benserade, written by the Abbot Tallemant, if ever it be printed.

This is what I said in the Year 1694; and my Conjecture has proved true: That Discourse of the Abbot Tallemant is to be found at the beginning of Benserade's Works, printed at Paris in the Year 1697, and in Holland 1698. The Particular, I have mentioned, is to be found in it.

[B] It is said, his Ancestors were very considerable.] It is the Custom of a Person, who is admitted into the French Academy, to make the Elogy of Him, to whom he succeeds. Mr Pavillon, Successor his Father died, he left him very young, with a very small Estate, and very much encumbered; so that he chose rather, as it is said, to give it away, than to go to Law about it (c). He made himself known to the Court by his Verses, and his Wit, and had the good Fortune to please Cardinal de Richelieu [C], and Cardinal Mazarin [D]; so that they put him in a Condition, not only to live handsomely, but also to lay up something lessor of Mr de Benferade, praised him with great Delicacy: See, here, in what manner he handled what related to his Extraction. "This is not a Place, where the Nobility of This illustrious Man ought to be displayed. Here the Chance of Birth makes no one to be esteemed or despised: Hence it is, that, in the Funeral Pomp of the deceased Members, the Images of their Ancestors are not carried before them; we only take care to expose their Talents, and their Works, to the public View. Let the Elogy of the Deceased be, every where else, adorned with the Name of the ancient Lords of Maline; let others reckon, among his Ancestors, Him, who, in the beginning of the last Century, was great Master of the Artillery: my Business, here, is only to speak of That, which made him admired in his Life-time, and will perpetuate his Memory after his Death (1)."

(1) See the Historical Letters of the Abbot Tallemant: "Tho' Mr de Benferade spoke but little of his Father, yet he did not forget his Ancestors, one of whom had been Chamberlain to one of our Kings, and Castellan of the Castle of Milan - - - By the Mother's Side, he was related to the Vignansours, and to the la Porter; his Mother bore the last Name, which was That of the Mother of Cardinal de Richelieu. — She would not willingly allow she was related to the Cardinal, saying, often, in her Family, she was not the la Porter, they took her for. — Admiral de Brézé looked upon Benferade as a Person belonging to him." It is affirmed, in the Epistle dedicatory of his Works (2), that he had the Honour to belong to the great Cardinal de Richelieu. I desire you to compare this with the following Passage of the Menagiana. By what I have heard, "Mr de Benferade was Son of an Attorney of Gisors; and I was much surprized, when the Abbot Regnier read here, the other Day, Mr Pavillon's Speech, which he made, when he was admitted into the Academy, wherein he gives Mr de Benferade a magnificent Genealogy. But I should not esteem him less, if he was of a meaner Birth. The Learned ought to value themselves for being the Sons of their own Works. Mr de Benferade had a pretty House at Gentilly, and, over the Gate of That House, he had set up a Coat of Arms, with an Earl's Coronet, which he had given himself. One of his Friends, seeing it, said, one Day, Poets may do these things (3)." Observe, that Mr Pavillon says nothing of what is mentioned by the Abbot Tallemant concerning Benferade's Ancestors; which makes me suspect, that they have followed some general Notions; for they would not have swerved so strangely from Uniformity, if they had followed Genealogical Titles, well proved. Whatever may be said of Benferade's Ancestors, his Father's Obscurity cannot be doubted. Some had heard say, that he was an Attorney of Gisors (4), and others, that he had been Justice in Eyre (5). His Son made but little mention of him, though he did not forget his Ancestors (6). Would you have a greater Proof of a mean Condition? Take notice of another thing. A great many Persons can prove their Father's Nobility, better than That of their Grand-father, and, if you would oblige them to prove That of their Great-Grand-father, they would find it more difficult still. Persius has made this Observation (7). It is quite the contrary here. We must skip over some Degrees, in going back, if we would get clear of Genealogical Darknels. Our Benferade finds nothing to please him in his Father, or his Grand-father; he finds his Nobility only in past Ages. It is certain, that Nobility of Blood is, sometimes, like Those Rivers, which fall down a Precipice, and, having run some Miles under Ground, rise again (8). obliged to make a Leap of One hundred and fifty Years back to unite two illustrious Ends in the Family of Benferade. I shall make hereafter (9) an Antithesis of Persius's Verses, in another Sense.

I know not what to say of one NICOLAS BENSERADE, to whom Erasmus wrote some Letters (10), and of whom he speaks, as of a very good Man, who had done him much good, and who had some Learning (11). He is called a Civilian (12). Would our Mr de Benferade have placed him among his Ancestors?

[C] He had the good Fortune to please Cardinal Richelieu. Mr Pavillon informs us, that This Cardinal took care of the Education of Benferade. "You have seen, says he (13), in This worthy Member, the Fruit of the Care, which the great Cardinal de Richelieu took of his Education; He, who gave Birth to your learned Assembly, educated him in his Youth; and, as Men are only considered by you in relation to their Wit, before you had associated him, he might have boasted, that you were Children of one and the same Father." These Words might induce one to think, that Benferade was known to This Cardinal only as a very hopeful young Man, who deserved so much the more That chief Minister's Protection, as he was the Son of a converted Huguenot; but, if we consider the Circumstances of the Time, if we consider, that the Cleopatra of Benferade was printed in the Year 1630 (14), we cannot doubt, but that he had actually a Share in Richelieu's Esteem, in Quality of an Author, and a fine Wit.

[D] — And Cardinal Mazarin. Give me leave to infer here a long Passage of a Book, the Title whereof is somewhat surprizing (15). Many Readers will be well pleased to see it here, without being obliged to turn to another Book: Besides, some of them may chance not to have the Arlequiniana in their Closets. "Your Story puts me in mind of a Thing, which made Benferade's Fortune: I have it from himself. Were you acquainted with him? Yes, said I, I conversed with him till his Death: He was the quickest Wit, and the most zealous Friend, that ever I saw; he was a good, and gallant, Man, and I will tell you, one Day, some particular things of him. You know then, replied Arlequin, that Benferade came young, agreeable, and full of merit, to Court. He applied himself to Cardinal Mazzarin, who loved him, but with such a Friendship, as produced no Advantage to him. Benferade, continuing to follow his Genius, made gallant Verses every Day, which gained him a great Reputation. The Cardinal, being one Evening with the King, related to him after what manner he had lived in the Pope's Court, where he had spent his Youth. He said, that he loved the Sciences, but that his chief Application had been to polite Learning, and especially Poetry, wherein he succeeded pretty well; and that he was, at That Pope's Court, what Benferade was at That of France. Soon after, he retired to his Apartment. Benferade happened to come in, an Hour after; and his Friends told him what the Cardinal had said; they had scarce ended, when Benferade, being filled with Joy, left them bluntly, without saying any thing. He ran to the Cardinal's Apartment, and knocked as hard as he could, to be heard. The Cardinal was just gone to Bed; Benferade was so preffing, and made so much Noise, that they were obliged to let him in. He went, and fell on his Knees by the Bolster of his Eminence's Bed, and, having begged a thousand Pardons for his Rudeness, he told him what he had heard, and thanked him, with an inexpressible Ardour, for the Honour he had done him in comparing himself to Him, as to the Reputation he had for Poetry; adding, withal, that he was so proud of it, that he could not contain his Joy, and that he should have died at his Door, if he had been hindered from coming to pay him his Acknowledgment for it. This Zeal pleased the Cardinal something for his latter Years. He had some Pensions assigned him on a Bishopric, and two Abbeys (d) [E]; so that he might be looked upon as a kind of Ecclesiastic (e). The Queen-Mother gave him a Pension of Three thousand Livres, when, upon the Death of Cardinal de Richelieu, he lost his Pension (f). He found means to subsist at Court, by means of the Thousand Crowns of the Queen-Mother, and by That of some rich and liberal Ladies (g). " Cardinal very much. He assured him of his Protection, and promised him that he would not be " useless to him; and indeed, six Days after, he sent " him a small Pension of Two thousand Livres;

" some time after, he had other considerable Pen" sions on Abbeys; and he might have been a " Bishop, if he would have been a Churchman (16)."
The Abbot Tallemant will not agree to this latter Fact. See the following Remark.

[E] He had some Pensions assigned him on a Bishopric, and two Abbeys.] He obtained one from Cardinal de Richelieu, " from the Time that his first Works
" appeared: it was continued to him till That Cardi" nal's Death; and he would, perhaps, have found
" the same Protection with the Dukes of Aiguillon,
" if the four following Verses, which he made after
" the Cardinal's Death, had not offended her very " much:

Cy-gift, ouy gift, par la mort-bleu,
Le Cardinal de Richelieu,
Et ce qui cause mon ennuy,
Ma pension avecque luy.

Here lies, ay here doth lie, morbleu,
The Cardinal de Richelieu,
And, what is worse, my Pension too.

" This Pension was pretty considerable, as I have " been assured; which was a terrible Loss to him,
" and which would have very much incommoded him,
" if it had not been made up by another of Three " thousand Livres, which the Queen-Mother gave " him (17). Let us admire here the Power of the " Habit of jesting. A Poet, who has a turn this way, " will rather hazard his Fortune, than lose the Opportu" nity of a Jest, even the most unnatural Opportunity,
" and the most opposite to Decency; for what can be " conceived more indecent, than to jest on the Death " of the greatest Man that ever was in the Ministry of " France? And if, for this reason alone, Pleasantry be " improper, it is still more so, when the Poet, who
" jests on that Subject, had received a considerable Pen" sion from the deceased. I cannot blame the Dukes
" of Aiguillon for suppressing this Pension; She was less " to be blamed for it, than Mr Benjerade. But let us
" proceed to other Favours, with which this fine Wit
" was gratified. Cardinal Mazarin procured him a " Pension of a thousand Crowns on the Abbey of St
" Eloy — and, when he died, left him a Pension of " Two thousand Livres on the Bishopric of Mende.
" Lastly, Benjerade had yet another Pension of Two " thousand Livres on an Abbey of the Abbot de Fou" rilles, called Haut-Villiers. — Besides this, he " had a yearly Rent of Five hundred Crowns on the " Town-house of Lyons, and a great deal of ready " Money (18). He would willingly " have had a " Title; and perhaps they would not grant him this " Favour, because he had not, at first, dedicated " himself wholly to the Church. But, if he did not " obtain That, which he had earnestly " desired (19), he met with something, which " he did not expect (20). We are told, afterwards
" in what manner he received the Three hundred Pi" stols, which the King sent him one Morning (21).
" That Prince gave Ten thousand Livres for the Fi" gures, wherewith the Round's of Benjerade on Ovid's
" Metamorphoses were adorned.

The Abbot Tallemant says, " It may perhaps be " wondered at, that, being so well to pass as he was,
" he jests so much on his Poverty: But, in answer
" to this, we need only distinguish the times; it was " at his first coming to Court." If the Dates were " well enquired into, it would perhaps be found, that " this Apology is not right, and that Mr Benjerade " complained of Poverty, even when he did not feel the " Inconveniences of it. He would not be the only

V O L. I.

Poet, who has been guilty of This Fault; and it is " an Irregularity, which deserves more to be censured,
" than That, for which Seneca was blamed, who praised
" and recommended Poverty in the midst of an excessive
" Opulency. It is better to do this, than to complain " of being poor, when one is in very good Circum" stances. However it be, our Benjerade is an example,
" which may be alleged against the Author of a pretty " Round, which I mention elsewhere (22), and which " begins thus, Le bel Esprit au siecle de Marot. His " Verses helped him to attain a pretty good Fortune,
" and put him in a Condition to be able to lend the " Ladies a Coach and Footmen. Doubtless, he de" served a Reward; but they should not have assigned " him Pensions on the Revenues of the Church, non " bos quæstium munus in usus. See the Remark [G]
" of the Article THOMAS. There is no question,
" but several other Wits envied him, as well on ac" count of his Coach, as because he had the Advantage " of frequently dining at the best Houses in Paris. One " of them (23) composed a Sonnet with this Conclusion:

Il frequente les bonnes tables,
Et je ne mange que chez moi:
J'en connois de plus miserables (24).

Abroad to Dinner he can roam;
But I, alas! must eat at home.

This is the taste of the ancient Parasites.

Si tristi domicænio laboras,
Turani, potes esurire mecum (25).

If there no Invitation be,
Turanius, you may fast with me.

Let us observe, that this Sonnet " was very improper
" at that Time; for sickness and weakness obliged
" Mr de Benjerade, towards the latter end of his " Life, to dine seldom abroad, and to make few " Visits (26)."

[F] The Court had resolved to depute him to the " Queen of Sweden; but it was not put in Execution.]
I have read this in a Letter of Cossar to the Marchio-" nels of Lovardin. Cossar's words deserve to be set " down; since they inform us, that Benjerade was not " in very good Circumstances at that time. It is an ill
" Custom among ingenious Gentlemen not to date their " Letters. If Cossar had dated his, we should know the " Year, wherein Benjerade was to have had This Em" ployment. " You have been informed, that the " Queen sends him to Sweden, and that he will set out " in a Week or ten Days. He has waited in vain, a " long time, at Paris. I do not know whether Stock" holm, and the Northern Air, will be more favour" able to his Fortune, than That of the Court has " been. I am sure, that all the Ice and Snow of the " North will not be able to extinguish That noble
" Fire, which animates him, and that the Presence of " the bravest and most ingenious of Queens will " inspire him with things, worthy to be conceived
" under a better Heaven, and milder Climate (27)."
See, in the Collection of the fine Pieces of the French

It is certain, This Dispute divided the whole Court, and the Wits, and that some very illustrious Persons declared, against Voiture, for Benferade. The latter succeeded wonderfully in the Verses, which he made for Interludes [H]; but he miscarried in his Rondeau's upon Ovid (i). He was admitted, somewhat late, into the French Academy, since it was in the Year 1674; and he was then above sixty Years of Age. He succeeded Chapelain in this Place, and made his Elogy, which displeased the Count de Rabutin (k), and which was rather an Homage paid to Custom, than an Effect of Sincerity. Some Years before his Death, he applied himself to pious Works, and translated almost all the Psalms (l): Another Homage paid to Custom; made these two Verses in his Gazettes; for Starron's Epistles ought not to be called by That Name.

Benferade.

[G] His Sonnet of Job ----- raised his Fame greatly.] This Sonnet, and That of Urania, occasioned a World of Verses, which may be seen in the Collection of choice Pieces. I believe, that, during the Course of this Contest, one of the finest and most ingenious Pieces was the Glose à Mr Esprit (29). Sarrasin composed it: he had declared for the Sonnet of Urania. Balzac wrote a severe Censure of these two Sonnets, which is to be found at the End of his Christian Socrates. When one examines this Censure, one cannot but say, that there are some excellent Pieces, which have great Imperfections. There are certain Beauties and Graces, which shine in such a Manner, in the midst of the Faults, which escaped the Author, that These Faults are not taken notice of. But, after all, I do not see, that these two Sonnets pass, at this time, for the best Pieces of their Authors. See what a good Critic (30) said of them; "Many Persons have concerned themselves in this Contest (31); and it is carried to such a Height, that considerable Wagers are laid in favour of the one, and of the other. But it is to be feared, that the same thing may happen to these two Pieces, that happened to Those two Sonnets, which divided Parnassus into two famous Factions, under the Names of the Jobelins, and the Uranists. For, being examined more narrowly, they lost a great deal of their Worth and Esteem.

The Author of the Epistle which serves as a Preface to the new Translation of Perfius and Juvenal (32), relates a curious Particular, which I cannot omit. "Thus (33) a great Prince, who knew a great deal, but who had still a better Taste, than Capacity, for good things, judged so well, in two small Verses, of the two famous Sonnets, which formerly amused the whole Court, and divided it into two Cabals of Wits, whose War was very innocent. Voiture had some formidable Partisans; and so had Benferade: but, in truth, the Decision of the Prince of Conti, which Nature alone dictated to him, gave the Cause to the Jobelins, and That without Appeal. This is the Decree.

L'un est plus grand, plus achevé;
Mais je voudrais avoir fait l'autre.

The One is more Grand, and more Perfect; but I would rather have been the Author of the Other.

"The first Verse relates to Voiture, and the second to Benferade; who, I believe, was very well satisfied with the wish of a Judge, who was so much the more incorruptible, as, in reading the terms, which he made use of, every Body perceives he judged without any partiality." The Abbot Talle-mant makes no mention of these two Verses of the Prince of Conti: though he says, that the Prince said, he never saw a finer Sonnet than That of Job. "The End of it, said his Highness, is the most lucky in the World; but, though the other Verses are very gallant, yet they seem rather careless, than polished and finished." Madam de Longueville declared for the Sonnet of Voiture (34). Note, that Benferade made his Sonnet upon sending the Paraphrase, he had composed, on Job, to a Lady (35); observe this, I say, as a Proof of the prophane Licence, which amorous Poets give themselves. Ought the Patience of Job, That Canonical, Divine, and Sacred, Example, to serve as an Introduction, or Text, to a Declaration of Love? Ought not a Christian Poet to have more respect for the Histories of the Bible? Ought he to have set his Patience, and his pretended Misery, above That of Job, under pretence that he was in love, and durst not declare it?

[H] He succeeded wonderfully in the Verses, which he made for Interludes.] These Verses were of quite a new Invention; They characterized, at the same time, the Poetical Deities, and the Persons, who represented them. The Author of the News from the Republic of Letters, has mentioned This Singularity by the by. "Mr de Benferade read (36) a Piece of his own Composition, which was wonderfully applauded. It is an abridged Picture of the forty Academists, as to their Persons, their Talents, Adventures, and Fortunes. He speaks freely of every one of them; but with That ingenious and inimitable Turn, which he made use of in his Verses for Interludes, personally proper to the Ladies and Lords of the Court, who were to appear in the Entries (37)." Mr Perrault explained this much better: Let us see what he says of it: "I am going to speak of another Kind of Poetry, which has been added to the Ancient; I mean the admirable Verses, which Mr de Benferade made for the King's Interludes. Heretofore, when they made Stanza's, upon Jupiter, for Instance, who, making his Entry, strikes the Cyclops with his Thunder-bolt, those Stanza's spoke only of Jupiter, as Jupiter, and not at all of the Person, who represented him. But Mr de Benferade turns his Verses in such a manner, that they are equally understood of both; and, as the King generally represented Jupiter, sometimes Neptune, and other times Mars, or the Sun, nothing is more admirable, than the delicate and artful Manner, in which he praises him, without addressing himself to him. The Person, who is represented, and the Actor, are both pointed at; which creates a double Delight, by giving two things to be understood at one time, which, being separately fine, become still finer, when joined together (38)." I add a third Witness to these two, because he describes the Verses in question more fully in some Respects, and because he supplies me with a Proof of two following Remarks. "We have lost, says he (39), a fine Wit, who excelled in the Art of fine and agreeable Rallery, both in his Conversation, and in his Writings; especially in the ingenious Verses for Interludes, which he made several Years for the whole Court. He was an Original in this Kind; the Ancients have not supplied him with any Model of This Sort of Rallery, and no one has hitherto succeeded in imitating it. He joined, to the Description of the Gods, and Goddesses, and other Persons, who were represented in these Interludes, some lively and natural Pictures of the Courtiers, who represented them: He often discovered their Inclinations, their Amours, and even their most private Adventures, in so fine, so pleasing, and so nice, a manner, that those, whom he pointed at, were the first, who were pleased with it, and that his jests did not affect them with Repentment, or Vexation, which is an essential Mark of their Perfection." See also the first Letter of the second Part of the Count de Rabutin, and the Discourse of the Abbot Talle-mant. In That Discourse you will find, that Benferade had a Quarrel with the President de Perigny, and with Moliere, who had both made Verses for Interludes. Which shews, that he desired to be the only Person, who should be employed in this Business.

Custom; but which may also proceed from a good Principle [I]. He died in the Month of November, 1691, in his Eighty second Year (m); others say, that he died before he was eighty Years of Age (n). He had a Pension from the Duke of Orleans, and an Apartment in the Royal Palace (o). He was a very honest Man, and of an admirable Conversation; having a good Talent at Jestings [K], and telling People their Faults, without making them angry [L]. He had a bold way with him, which made him behave familiarly towards those of the first Quality; so that he might say what he would, without being contradicted; nay, he seemed to have an ascendancy over the most considerable Persons. — His Familiarity had even something imperious in it; for he was not contented with taking the Liberty of contradicting others, but would not suffer his own Compositions to be criticized, and defended them so conceitedly, that those very Persons, whom he consulted, could not speak their Thoughts without exposing themselves to his Anger (p). He was sincere, and very officious, especially to the Ladies; for his Coach, and his Servants, were always at their Service (q). He was not learned [M]; but I would not alledge, as a Proof of his Ignorance, that he could not tell, one Day, what Difference there is between the Hamadryads and the Dryads [N]. He began early to appear in Print; for it is said, that his Tragedy of Cleopatra was printed in the Year 1630; which made some say, that he was more than a Jubilate Author [O]. Furciere abused him

[I] It was perhaps in compliance with Custom, that he translated the Psalms in his old Age; which might also proceed from a good Principle. I am the more inclined to believe this proceeded from a good Principle in Mr de Benjerade, because his Submission to God was very great during his last Sickness. Let us quote the Abbot Tallemant for it. "No Man could begin his Life with more Gallantry, nor end it with more Piety, or a greater Submission to the Will of God, than Mr de Benjerade. He suffered such violent Pains, that Job, whose Patience he had celebrated, did hardly suffer sharper; they were so terrible, that one of a less lively Temper, and much less sensible than he was, could not have been able to bear them (40)."

[K] He had good Success in Jestings. A Passage, which I have just now quoted (41), shews, that he was Master of this Talent. Here is another Testimony, taken from the same Author. It is a Testimony, which may be called practical; for it consists in an Example. "A Courtier was suspected of being impotent, and would not own it; he meet Benjerade, who had often jeered him about it, and said to him, Sir, notwithstanding all your poor jesting, my Wife is lately brought to Bed, Alas! Sir, replied Benjerade, the World never doubted of your Lady (42)." You may find some of his witty Sayings in the Continuation of the Menagiana, and in the Discourse of the Abbot Tallemant.

[L] He told People their Faults, without making them angry. Nothing is more true, than the Saying, Obsequium amici, veritas odium parit, that is, Friends are made by Complaisance, and Enemies by speaking Truth. They, therefore, who know how to make Truth appear without that odious Look, which commonly attends it, must needs have a very singular Dexterity. This was the Talent, which Benjerade was praised for by his Successor. "What a wonderful Address, to make the most passionate Men bear jesting, and to praise the Modest, without offending their Modesty; to speak the Truth in the midst of a Court, without prejudicing his Fortune, and to divert those very Persons, whose faults he reproved. Amiable Censor, whose ingenious Verses, being purged from the Gall of Satire, found the admirable Art of reproving All, and offending none (43)." Mr Pavillon cannot be accused of having carried the Matter too far, though what is said in some Fadums (44) should be true; for there is no general Rule, but will admit of an Exception: It is the Author of the Fadums, who may be suspected of overtrusting things. He says (45), that Benjerade "had set up for a Gallant in the old Court, by Songs and Ballad-Verses, which had gained him a Reputation during the Reign of bad Taste, Double Meanings, and Points, which still keep their Credit with him. They have drawn upon him, continues he, some Threats, and melancholy Adventures, which have served by way of Date to certain burlesque Gazettes." At Page 28 of the third Fadum, he says, that "the scandalous List, which Benjerade drew up, of the Academy, and which he had the Assurance to read publicly in one of the solemn Assemblies, contained such shocking and outrageous things, that they drew upon him the Threats of a Person of the first Quality, who was concerned in them; inasmuch that, notwithstanding his Impudence, he was obliged to suppress it out of respect to his own Shoulders (46)."

[M] He was not Learned. This was so well known, that no scruple was made of owning it, when Mr Pavillon was admitted into the French Academy, a Day favourable to Mr Benjerade, wherein they were rather disposed to give him more than his Due, than to take from him what belonged to him. See, here, how Mr Charpentier expressed himself in the Answer he made to the Discourse of the new Academist. "The Society has lost one of its Ornaments in Mr de Benjerade: He was an original Wit, and owed all his Reputation to himself alone. He equalled the Ancients, without borrowing any thing of them; NEITHER WERE THEY VERY WELL KNOWN TO HIM; and, if any of their Thoughts have appeared in his Writings, it was rather an effect of Chance, than of Imitation. He shewed, that one could still produce something new under the Sun; and this Character of Novelty was so natural to him, that, whenever he would forsake it, he was no more the same Man; and the Correspondence, which he held with the Graces, became interrupted, when he followed other Ideas, than his own." I do not wonder that this want of Erudition was not suppressed; for it afforded matter for a delicate and refined Elogy.

[N] He could not explain the Difference between the Hamadryads, and the Dryads. The Thing is This: We shall see, that he came off with a Piece of Wit. "Being one Day at the Opera, in the Box of the Duke of Orleans, the King's Brother, the Dukes of Orleans asked him, What difference there was between the Hamadryads, and the Dryads? He found himself much perplexed; but, not thinking it fit to be silent, and perceiving, that an Archbishop, and a Bishop, waited in the Passage for the Dukes's going out, being unwilling to shew their Crosses in the Box, he replied, There was as much difference as between Bishops, and Archbishops. This immediately raised a laugh, and the Dukes repeating it the next Day at her Toilet, some one, looking upon a Clergyman, his Friend, said, pointing to him, Here is one your Higness may make a Dryad, and Hamadryad of, whenever you are pleased to go about it seriously (47)." Mr Benjerade's Perplexity in this Case does not seem to me a true Sign of Ignorance; for I am sure, that the Question of the Dukes of Orleans would have put several celebrated Regent Doctors to a stand (48). These things are better known when we first leave the College, than after we have grown old in more sublime Studies.

[O] He was more than a Jubilate Author. This Expression is borrowed from a Cloyster. A Monk of fifty Years Profession, is a Jubilate Religious, who is excused from Matins, and the Rigors of the Rule, in some Places (49). The Convents have formed this Expression on the Duration of the Jewish Jubilee, which was of fifty Years (50). See how Mr Menage proves, that Mr Benjerade was more than a Jubi-too much in his Fadums (r). Sarrafin had a fling at him, in the Funeral Pomp of Voiture: It is He, whom he calls Rouffelin de Grenade, in the third Chapter of The great Chronicle of the noble Vetturius; and he makes use of this Name, because Benserade was red-haired [P]; and because he used to say, in jest, and by reason of the Resemblance of Names, that he was descended from the Abencerrages. I found this written with a Pen, in the Margin of a Copy of The Funeral Pomp of Voiture, in possession of a Person, who knew the Secret History of that Time. It appears by this Chapter of Sarrafin, that Benserade had supplanted Voiture, in the House of Madam de Saintot [Q]. I was in hopes to have found many things relating to the Life of Mr de Benserade, in the Collection of the finest Pieces of the French Poets (s): The Title assured me of it; but, when I came to read the Page, referred to in the Table, I did not meet with one Line of History in it.

a Jubilate Author. He supposes, that the Cleopatra of This Author was printed in the Year 1630, and then goes on in this manner: "He died in the Year 1691, aged eighty Years: So that he wrote That Piece Sixty one Years ago; and I suppose, that he was at least twenty Years of Age when he composed it. Moreover, it is to be observed, that a Piece for the Stage was seldom printed until a Year after it had been acted the first Time (51)."

(51) Menagiana, pag. 335, Edit. 1797 of Holl.

Mr Menage is mistaken, in supposing, that The Cleopatra of our Author was printed in the Year 1630; and I am surprized, that, having so many Opportunities of coming at the Truth of this Fact, at Paris, he neglected to inform himself, or to employ, in the Enquiry, some of those young Persons, who attended his Mercurials. By Accident, I have met with a Copy of the first Edition of the Cleopatra of Benserade (52); and have found, by this means, that this Piece was printed for Antony de Sommeville, in 4to, and finished the Twenty ninth of March, 1636.

(52) It is likely the same, which Mr. Menage calls Cleopatra.

Let us add, to this, these Words of the Abbot Tallemant. "He had scarce left the College, when he produced two or three Dramatic Pieces; I have seen two of them, one of which was entitled, Iphis and Hianthe, and the other Marc Antony (53): Both of them had pretty good Success; But, if he loved Comedy, he was no less fond of the Astretres; and it is said, that, with the late Marquis d' Armentieres, who was then an Abbot, he left the Sorbonne, where their Parents would have had them study, and went almost every Day to the Hotel de Bourgogne, where they met their Mistresses, who were la Vallette, and the Fair Roze (54)."

[P] Benserade was red haired.] The Abbot Tallemant believes, that Benserade loved the fair Roze, because of the likeness of their Hair: Her Hair was of a lively fair Colour; as for him, he confessed freely, that he was red haired, and called himself so, and thereupon compared himself with some of the greatest Lords of the Court, without troubling himself whether it would please them or not (55)."

(54) Tallemant's Discours on Benserade.

[Q] He had supplanted Voiture, in the House of Madam de Saintot.] Sarrafin expresses himself thus: How Vetturius came to the Court of Queen Lionelle de Galle: How he fell in Love with her, and how he was driven from thence by the Intrigues of Hunault d'Armorique, and of Rouffelin de Grenade. The Manuscript Notes of my Copy (56) inform me, that Madam de Saintot was denoted under the Name of Lionelle de Galle, because of Gaillonet, her Father's House. Mr de la Hannaudaye, who was a Breton, was denoted by Hunault d'Armrique.

BERAULD (NICOLAS), in Latin Beraldis, ought to be reckoned among the Learned of the XVIth Century. He was Tutor to Admiral de Coligny [A]. Erasmus praises him in more than one place [B], and confesses, that, passing through Orleans, in his Way to Italy, he lodged at his House [C], and received many Favours from

and told him, he knew how to remedy it, for that he designed Gaspar for the Church; and that Odet, as the eldest, should keep up the Honour of his Family. — Berauld, being surprized at this Answer, asked him, Whether it was requisite, that an Ecclesiastic should be ignorant, and a Man of the World learned? This Discourse of Berauld made the Constable perceive, that he had mistaken the Matter; and he was very well pleased to hear, that Gaspar had so good a Disposition for Learning, and that there was reason to hope something good of him. But, Berauld having related this Conversation to his Scholar, he was so afraid of being made a Churchman, that they could no longer prevail with him to look into a Book.

[B] Erasmus praises him, in more than one place.] What he says of him, in his Ciceronianus, is a Mixture of good and bad; for, if on the one hand he allows him the Talent of Speaking well, he says, on the other hand, that he had not the Talent of Writing well, and represents him as very indolent. "Agnosco dictationis elaborato fluxu Pino non diffimilem: verum in hoc genere nunquam nervos intendit suos, dicendo quam scripto felicius. Quid possit, satis divino, sed est magni laboris fugatior (3). — I acknowledge, he is not unlike Pinus, in the easy flow of his Style: but he never exerts himself this way, being a bapier Speaker, than Writer. What he is capable of doing, I can easily divine; but he is of an indolent Disposition, and hates Trouble." In the following Remark, the Praises he gives him are more pure, and in greater Number. Observe, that he dedicated his Book, de Conscribendis Epistolis, to him, in the Year 1522.

He wrote upon Pliny [F]; of which Father Hardouin has made no mention, in his excellent Catalogue of the Commentators on That ancient Author. He expressed a just Concern, in his Preface, for the Abuses of the Press. Doubtless, the Reader will be well pleased to see his Complaint [G], and the Catalogue of some other Pieces, which he published [H]. One thing has been lately reported, whereby it appears, that he was an honest

"scarce prevail with him to permit me to refuse." This Letter is dated the Twenty first of February, 1516: from whence it may be inferred, that Berauld was not young, when he made Preceptor to the Sons of the Marfhal de Châtillon. But how shall we reconcile That Volubility of Tongue, which Eraſmus, an Ear-Witness, ascribes to him, with the following Words? "The Admiral had two things in "him, which seemed extremely opposite, viz. a great "Vivacity of Wit, and a very slow Speech; so that "one would have said, that he mused upon what "he was going to say. The Politicians would have
"it to be a Piece of Cunning to gain time to ob-

"Thing was observed (5)." [D] Some say, that he was born at Orleans.] Nicolas Beraldi AURELII . . . dialogus. . . . The Dialogue of Nicolas Beralus of Orleans. Thus speaks Gesner (6). See also Recolles, Page 214 of the true History of Calvinism. I shall set down his Words in the following Remark.

[E] Others affirm, that he was of Languedoc.] Their Mother, Louise de Montmorency, assisted with the Advice of her Brother, took care of their Edu"cation, and gave them Nicolas Berauld, born in "Languedoc, for their Tutor, but he had acquired
"Literature at Paris, whither he came very young." These Words are in the eighth Page of the new Life of the Admiral. Gesner might be deceived by the long Abode, which Berauld made at Orleans, where he was Professor of the Civil-Law, if I am not mistaken. Recolles speaks of it thus, at the Two hundred and fourteenth Page of the true History of Calvinism: Nicolas Berauld, of Orleans, A great CIVILIAN. Gesner mentions a Speech of Berauld, de Jurisprudencia veteris ac novitiae.

[F] He wrote upon Pliny.] He is the third of the Commentators on That Author, mentioned by Eraſmus. Hermolaus Barbarus is the first (7), Budæus the second, and John Casareus the fourth. "Post hunc (Budæum) Nicolas Beralus, homo su-

"formed This Task, and, what demonstrated the "Soundness of his Judgment, with no less Religion, "than Care. Last of all, Joannes Casareus, a "thorough learned Man, bestowed his Pains not un"successfully." Eraſmus speaks thus, in the Preface to Pliny, which was printed at Basle, by Fisken, in the Year 1525. He assures us, that he had corrected many Passages, and that Pliny had never appeared in a better Condition. In ceteris item ita vigilatum est, ut meo periculo non dubitem polliceri nunquam balteus exisse Plinium fideius tractatum (9). Nevertheless Father Hardouin says nothing of this Edition, and he only reckons Casarius (so he calls him) among those, who wrote on some Part of Pliny. He ascribes to him only some Sevilla on what relates to Fishes, in the ninth Book. Mr Chevillier goes, then, too far, in their Words of the One hundred ninety first Page of his Origin of Printing at Paris: "I wondered, when I saw, that nothing was "said, there, of John Casarius, and that no men"tion was mention was made of his Work,
"neither in the Preface, nor in the List of the chief "Editions of That famous Author, which was in-

[G] His Complaint of the Abuses of the Press.] James Fontaine, Professor of the Civil-Law in the University of Paris . . . very much approves the Advice, which Nicolas Berauld gave to Sovereigns, to redress this Evil, and to make Edicts to remove all those from the noble Art of Printing, who, for want of Learning, should be judged incapable of exercising it. Quare prudentissimè in Præfatione operis sui Pliniani admonet longè eruditissimus Nicolas Beralus, ut aliquo publico decreto insolentissima ista ignorantum Impressorum audacia reprimatur; quibus hoc debemus studiosi, quod pro unaquaque literâ invenimus plagam, pro Syllabâ crucem, pro libro tormentum. Sed rei indignitas, quæ loqui compulsi, etiam tacere cogit. . . . The very learned Berauld very prudently advises, in the Preface to his Work on Pliny, to repress, by public Decree, the uncommon Impudence of ignorant Printers; to whom the Learned owe That Perplexity and Torment, which every Letter and Syllable of a Book affords them (11). These Words of James Fontaine are to be found in the Elogy, which he made upon Bertboldus Rembolt a famous Printer. It occurs in the Sexte of the Decretals, printed, by Chevalon, in the Year 1520 (12).

[H] Some other Pieces, which he published.] Here are Those, which Gesner mentioned; *Dialogus, quo rationes explicantur, quibus dicendi ex tempore facultate parari potest; deque ipsa dicendi ex tempore facultate; at Lyons, 1534: De Jurisprudencia veteris ac novitiae oratio, cum erudita ac antiquorum lectionem ac studium exhortatione, at Lyons, 1533: Notes on the Rusticus, and on the Nutricia, of Politian. It is true, that Gesner is not positive, as to this last Work. Fertur etiam in Politian's Nutricia scriptis, si bene memini (13). Jodocus Badius, dedicating the second Part of Politian's Works to Lewis de Berquin, in the Year 1512, excuses himself as well as he can, for not having yet printed the most learned, and most solid Epistle, which Berauld had composed against Laurentius Valla, and dedicated to his good Friend, Lewis de Berquin. Recolles says, that This Work of Berauld was entitled, Of Recrimination, against Laurentius Valla, Anthony of Palermo, and Bartholomew Ficius (14). The Catalogue of the Bodleian Library mentions a Dictionarium Græco-Latinum Nicolai Beraldi, printed at Paris, in the Year 1521, and another Book, entitled Syderalis abyssus, printed at the same Place, in 1514.*

honest Man [I]. He was very much esteemed by Stephen Poncher, Bishop of Paris, and afterwards Archbishop of Sens (a), a Prelate of great Authority in the Kingdom, and a Patron of Learning. His Son, FRANCIS BERAULD, was a very learned Man. He understood Greek well, and taught it at Montbeillard, in the Year 1554 (b). He taught at Lausanne, when Beza went thither in 1549 (c). He taught there also, in the Year 1557 (d). He was at Geneva in the Year 1561 (e). He was Principal of the College of Montargis, in the Year 1571 (f); from whence he went to Rochel, to exercise the like Employment (g). He was a good Greek and Latin Poet (b). It is unnecessary to observe, that he was a Protestant. He translated some Books of Appian [K].

[I] He was an honest Man.] Madam de Chatillon, and her Brother, the Comfable de Montmorency, had a Mind to make a Churchman of Gaspar de Coligny, and, knowing from him, that it was against his Inclination, he ordered Berauld to insinuate their Pleasure to him, thinking that, as he had all along governed his youthful Spirit, he knew better how to prevail with him, than any one else. They represented to him, that his Scholar might forget him in the Profession of Arms; but that, in an Ecclesiastical State, he would always stand in need of him, and load him with Benefices. They could not have taken a more cunning way to engage him to do what they desired: But Berauld, who was more honest, than interested, instead of using all the Endeavours, which they expected, only represented to his Pupil the Advantages of the Dignity of a Cardinal, and at the same time pointed out to him the Dangers of it, and advised him not to engage in it against his Inclination (15).

[K] He translated some Books of Appian.] Henry Stephens made choice of him to translate Annibal's Wars, and Those of Spain. "Sicut hocce duos Libellos 'à me ex Italia (uti dixi) allatos primus edidi, ita etiam primus latinè vertendos curavi, & quidem delecto ad id munus viro Græcæ linguæ non parum perito, Francisco Beraldo Aurelianensi (16). '----- As I was the First, who published these two Books, which, as I said, I had brought with me from Italy, so was I the First, who got them translated into Latin, having, for that Purpose, made choice of Francis Berauld of Orleans, a Man not a little skilled in the Greek Language." He shews, in his Notes, why he preferred Francis Berauld's Translation before That of Cælius Secundus Curio.

BERAULT (CLAUDE), Author of The Commentary on Statius, in usum Delphini, died at Paris, in the Month of March, 1705. He was Regius Professor of Syriac, after the Death of Mr d'Herbelot.

BERAULT (MICHAEL), Minister, and afterwards Professor of Divinity at Montauban, flourished about the end of the XVIIth Century, and beginning of the XVIIIth. He became very considerable among Those of his Party. He had been a Monk, if we may believe Scaliger, who gives him the Character of a learned and able Man (a). He was pitched upon, in 1593, to dispute against Perron, in the Conference of Mante, as I have said in another Place (b); and he published a Work against the same Perron, in the Year 1598 [A]. During the Civil Wars, he greatly favoured the Interests of the Duke de Rohan, and he published, with That View, several Pieces, which brought him into Trouble [B]. In 1605, he almost publicly made Interest, to be appointed Deputy to the General-Assemblies of the Protestants (c). He informs us of an Æra, which is very curious: I mean That, which induced many Protestant Divines of France to begin to read the Fathers (d).

(d) See the Preface to his Book, entitled, A Defence of the Vocation of the Ministers.

[A] He published a Work against the same Perron, in 1598.] It was printed at Montauban, by Dennis Haulin, and dedicated to the Magistrates, and People, of the Town. It is an Octavo of Four hundred ninety-eight Pages, entituled, A short and clear Defence of the Vocation of the Ministers of the Gospel against the Reply of M^{rs} James Davy, Bishop of Evreux, drawn up Article by Article from the same Reply.

[B] ----- Some Pieces, which brought him into Trouble.] The King's Commissary at the National Synod of Charenton, in 1631, demanded, among other things, "That the Ministers should be prohibited from meddling with State Affairs (1). This was aimed at Berauld, Minister of Montauban, a Man of a warm Spirit, and who went fast. During the last Troubles, he had written a Book, in which, not satisfied with justifying the taking up of Arms, he undertook to maintain, that the Ministers themselves had a Call to bear them, and to shed Blood. The Commissary aggravated the Importance of This Opinion, which was dangerous in such a Man, as Berauld, who, besides the Quality of Minister, had That likewise of Professor of Divinity. He first pronounced the Condemnation of the guilty Person, and then ordered the Synod to censure him. Before they could give any Answer in the Affair of Berauld, it was necessary to hear him (2). He owned the Book; He pretended, he had not taught in it the Doctrine he was charged with, and excused whatever was suspicious in it from the Malice of the Times. He said, there were, indeed, some ambiguous Expressions in it; and that he detested the Consequence, which was drawn from them. The Commissary would not admit of this kind of Excuse; and he convicted Berauld of having expressly written, in a Preface to his Book, the Things, of which he was accused. So that he was severely censured by the Synod, who treated the Expressions of his Book as scandalous Terms, which he had improperly made use of. This Doctrine was condemned, and the Ministers were forbid to teach it. In the mean time, Berauld was secluded the Synod; and, before his re-establishment, he incurred a fresh Censure on the Part of the Commissary."

After the Deputies of the Synod had harangued the King, Berauld was permitted to take his Seat in the Assembly (3).

(a) Held at Sens.

BERENGARIUS (PETER), of Poitiers, Disciple of Abelard, espoused his Master's Interest very much, who was condemned by a Council (a) in 1140; and because he looked upon St Bernard as the chief Cause of his Condemnation, he wrote most vehemently against him. He published An Apology for Abelard (b), wherein he

(b) It is printed with the Works of Abelard at Paris, 1616.

he sets forth, that his Enemies prepared the Judgment of the Trial amidst their Cups [A], and that the accused, seeing the ill Disposition of his Judges, desired, that his Cause might be referred to the Pope [B]; that, nevertheless, they condemned him, and that St Bernard preposited the Holy Father, with so much Diligence, that Abelard was speedily condemned at Rome, without being heard [C], and even without giving him time to appear before the Tribunal, to which he had appealed. Upon this the Apologist relates the Reasons, which might be alledged in favour of St Bernard, viz. That the Zeal of GOD's House had eaten him up; that the Leprosy, which disfigured the Body of the Church, would have spread all over it, if the Evil had not been stifled in it's Birth; and that, to save the Readers the trouble of turning over several Volumes, it had been thought fit to give a short List of Abelard's pernicious Propositions. He, who made Those Extracts, cannot be excused; and, whether St Bernard alone was at the Trouble of doing it, or whether, besides the Propositions extracted by him, he produced Those, which others supplied him with, it is certain, that This Passage of his Life does little Honour to his Memory [D]. The List, which he produced, contained some things, which Abelard had never said, nor

[A] He sets forth, in his Apology for Abelard, that his Enemies prepared the Judgment of the Trial amidst their Cups. A more satirical Description cannot be seen, than That, which Berengarius gives of the Preliminaries of That Synodal Judgment. He says that, after the Fathers of the Council had well eat and drank, they caused Peter Abelard's Writings to be read to them. While it was read to them, they stamped with their Feet, they laughed, they jeered, they drank; and when they heard any thing, which was new to their Ears, they gnashed their Teeth against the Author, and demanded of each other, If they would suffer such a Monster to live? They had drank so much, that they fell asleep; so that, when their Reader met with some suspicious Passages, and asked, If they did not condemn it? They started out of their Sleep, and said, half asleep, some dammamus, and others only namus. Berengarius's Words have greater force, than mine; therefore give me leave to produce them. He applies the Thoughts of the ancient Latin Poets very prettily. "Post aliqua Pontifices infultare, pedem pedi ap- plodere, ridere, nugari conspiceres, ut facile qui- libet judicaret illos non Christo vota persolvere, sed Baccho. Inter hæc salutantur cyphi, pocula celebrantur, laudantur vina, Pontificum guttura ir- riganur. — Lethæi potio fucci Pontificum cor- da jam sepeliera. Ecce, inquit Satyricus,

- - - - inter pocula querunt
Pontifices faturi quid dia poemata narrent.

"Denique cum aliquid subtile divinumque sonabat quod auribus pontificalibus erat insolitum, audientes omnes dissecabantur cordibus suis, & stridebant dentibus in Petram, & oculos talpæ habentes in Philosophum, hoc, inquit, sineremus vivere mon- strum. — Cujus (vini) calor ita incefferat cere- bris, ut in somni letargiam oculi omnium solverentur. Inter hæc sonat lector, sterit auditor. Alius cubito innititur ut det oculis suis somnum, alius super molle cervical dormitionem palpebris suis molitur, alius super genua caput reclinans dormitat. Cum itaque lector in Petri fati aliquid reperiret spinetum, furdus exclamabat auribus Pontificum, damnatis? Tunc quidam vix ad extremam syllabam expergefacti, somnolenta voce, capite pendulo, dammamus ajebant. Alii vero damnantium tumul- tu excitati, decapitata prima syllaba, namus inquit. I cannot forbear inserting here this short Story. A Judge was wont to fall asleep sometimes on the Bench: "One Day the President, gathering the Votes of the Court, and coming to ask his: he answered, starting out of his Sleep, and not being quite awake, That his Opinion was, that the Man should be beheaded. But the Business in hand is about a Meadow, said the President: Let it be mowed then; replied the Judge (1). Balzac had perhaps read this in a burlesque Piece of Francis Holman, disguised under the Name of Matago- nibus, against Matthæus. "Nota omnibus, says he, est historia de eo qui cum dormiens præ- die excitatus & sententiam interrogatus esset, iemi- somnis dixit, suspendatur, suspendatur, credens criminem processum esse. Cui præcis, quinimo, inquit, agitur de prato; ergo defalcetur, respondit ebrius."

[B] Seeing the ill Disposition of his Judges, he appealed to the Pope. Orto Frisingensis says, that Abelard apprehended he should be overwhelmed by popular Tumults, and that, to avoid this Misfortune, he demanded to be referred to the Court of Rome. Dum de fide sua discuteretur, seditionem populi timent, Apostolicæ sedis præsentiam appellavit (2). He had reason to distrust a Mob, animated by the Declama- tions of his Accusers, who cried him down as a Destroyer of the most Holy Mysteries of the Gos- pel.

[C] At the Instigation of St Bernard, he was condemned without being heard. The same Injustice was done him, in the Council of Soissons, and this was done on a very ill Pretence; which was, That they feared the Subtlety of his Logic, and the Force of his Eloquence. Libros quos ediderat propria manu ab Episcopis igni dare coactus est, nulla sibi respondendi facultate, eo quod disceptandi in eo peritia ab omnibus suspecta haberetur, concessa (3). The President of Ar- gentré, had reason to find fault, that, upon such an account, they should transgress one of the most Sa- cred Laws of Justice; that No Man ought to be condemned unheard; audiatur & altera pars.

Qui statuit aliquid parte inaudita altera,
Æquum licet statuerit, haut æquus fuerit (4).

He, who determines any thing, without hearing the other side, though he determines right, is unjust.

Here is what He, who published Peter Abelard's Works, says of That Author; "Queritur eum non fuisse auditum in Concilio contra eum coacto, quod omnes quantumvis docti & subiles ejus acumen ingenii, lingue verfatilis volubilitatem, eloquentiæ flumen aureum, vel potius fulmen igneum & tri- fulcum, syllogismorum gryfos & contorta entyme- mata, reformidant (5). — He complains, that Abelard was not heard, in the Council, which was called against him; because All of them, learned and subtle as they were, dreaded the Acuteness of his Wit, the Volubility of his Tongue, the golden Flow, or rather Lightning, of his Eloquence, with the Sub- tility and Pointedness of his Syllogisms and Enty- mæ's

[D] — this Proceeding of St Bernard does little Honour to his Memory. Zeal and Solitude made him very choleric, and very credulous, if we may believe the same Author (6). This Observation was made by a more ancient Author, though it has not retained all the Impressions of it's Original; for see what Orto Frisingensis says: "Erat autem Bernardus Claraval- lensis Abbas tam ex Christianæ religionis fervore zelotypus, quam ex habituali mansuetudine quo- dammodo credulus, ut & Magistros, qui humanis rationibus seculari sapientia confisi nimium inha- rebant, abhorreret, & si quicumque ei Christianæ fidei absonum de talibus diceretur, facile aurem præberet (7). — Bernard, Abbot of Clairvaux, was both passionately zealous for the Christian Religion, and, thro' an habitual Mildness of Dis- position, a little too credulous; insomuch, that he abhorred those Teachers, who, depending on worldly Wisdom, stuck too much to human Reason; and, whenever they were reported to him to have ad- vanced any Doctrine contrary to the Christian Faith, — he nor written; and some things, which Abelard never understood according to the Sense, which was imputed to him (c). This is what the Apologist intended to shew, in the second Part of his Work; but he did not write it; and he had his Reasons for it [E]. In the mean time, he gave St Bernard to understand, in the first Part, that he should not persecute others on account of their Doctrine, since his own Writings were not free from Errors. He maintained, against him, That he had taught a Thing, which he would not have failed to infer, as a monstrous Doctrine, in his Extracts out of Abelard, if Abelard had vented it (d). This Recrimination of Berengarius was useless; he had to do with one of those privileged Persons, who acquire the Benefit of Impunity, by the great Services, which they pretend they have done to the Cause [F]. He had no better Success in representing to That Informer the Indulgence, which was shewn to the Errors of some Fathers of the Church. Besides This Piece of Berengarius, we have two Letters of his, one to the Bishop of Mende, the other against the Carthusians. They are printed with Abelard's Works. He supports, in all his Writings, the Character of a fiery, fowre, Spirit, which Petrarch gave him [G]; but he says, that his Invektive against the Carthusians was

"be readily believed it." Thus the Providence of God dispenses good and evil: Most of Those, who have a great Zeal, become credulous and suspicious, and easily conceive an extraordinary Animosity against Those, whom they suspect; They write Letter upon Letter against them (8); They alarm the Consciences of others, and give themselves no rest, 'till they have inspired their Prepossessions into every Body. If a Book is to be examined, God knows how difficult it is for them to understand the true Sense of the Author, and to put the most equitable Construction upon his Words. See the Remark [I].

[E] He did not write the second Part of his Apology for Abelard; and he had his Reasons for it.] Perhaps he did not give the true Reason of his Silence. This Reason was, probably, the fear of stirring up all the Monks, and the Clergy, against him, and of being exposed thereby to the People's Indignation, and a thousand Mischiefs. He knew how odious he had made himself by the first Part of his Book; but the second would have much more exasperated the People. The first contained only hard Words, and Reproaches, with some Recriminations, which could do but little Prejudice to St Bernard; but the second would have convicted him of Knavery, or Ignorance, and consequently of being an unjust Persecutor. The plainer the thing had been, the more angry they would have been with Berengarius, the Destroyer of an holy Reputation, so usefully established in the Minds of People. So that he found it more proper to be silent, and to justify his Silence by shameful Nonsense. He declared, that Time had made him wise, and that he had embraced St Bernard's Opinion, and refused to protect Doctrines, which founded ill, though they were not bad in the main: Lastly, That if he had said any thing against the Man of God, he desired it should be looked upon as said in jest, and not in earnest. Processu temporis meum sapere crevit: & in sententiam Abbatis pedibus, ut dicitur, ivi. Nolut esse patronus capitulorum obsectorum Abelardo, quia estis sanum sapientem, non sane sonabant. - - - Si quid in personam hominis Dei dixi joco, legatur non serio (9). And yet, a little before, he had said, that his Censure of St Bernard was well grounded. It is the true Sense of these Words: Legant eruditi viri Apologeticum quem edidi, & si dominum Abbatem justum non argui, licenter me redarguant. Is not this the Nonsense of a Man, who dares not say, that he is in the right, and who is ashamed to confess, that he is in the wrong?

[F] He had to do with one of those privileged Persons, who acquire the Benefit of Impunity by the great Services, which they pretend they have done to the Cause.] St Bernard had a very agreeable Stile: The whole World was over-run with the Productions of his Pen; his Books flew every where; and were in great Numbers. Mirantur homines in te liberalium disciplinarum ignaro tantam ubertatem facundie, quia emissionis tue jam cooperuerunt universam superficiem terræ (10). The Reputation of his Sanctity, Zeal, and Miracles, was no less spread, than That of his Pen. Jamdudum sanctitatis tue odorem ales per orbem fama dispersit, præconisavit merita, miracula declaravit (11). With all these Advantages, he was able to ruin any Man's Reputation; much less could so great a Philosopher, as Abelard, expect to pass for Orthodox in spite of him. Berengarius has very happily represented the Authority of the Man of God in this manner, "Damnatur, prohi dolor! absens, inauditus, & inconvictus. Quid dicam, quidve non dicam? Bernarde,

Nil opus est bello, veniam pacemque rogamus,

Porrigimus junctas ad tua lora manus.

Jura cadent rerum, vertetur sanctio legum,

Si vis, si mandas, si sic decernis agendum,

Quem penes arbitrium est & vis & norma loquendi (12).

(12) Ibid.
pag. 307.

"He is condemned, alas! absent, unheard, and unconvicted. What shall I say, or what shall I not say? O Bernarde,

Enough of War; henceforth let Discord cease;

Vanquish'd, to Thee we humbly sue for Peace;

Right shall be Wrong, Unlawful Law shall be;

For Right and Law depend alone on Thee.

Where is the Orthodoxy, that can hold out against such Accusers? The People are so much prepossessed, that they will scarce suffer one to make a Defence; It cannot be done without charging the Promoter of the Process, and the Informer, with Calumny; but there is no enduring This. What? shall we suffer so great a Servant of God to be defamed, as an egregious Calumniator? God forbid: the Honour of the Church is too much concerned in it. Thus an inconsiderable private Man may say; "I shall be Orthodox, or Heterodox, according as such a one pleases; for, if he attacks my Doctrine, they neither dare, nor can, absolve me; My Justification would disgrace him, and would rejoice the Enemy too much. In vain might I accuse him, in my turn; no regard would be had to it: I have not laboured for the Good of the Church like him; I do not deserve the Immunities, which are due to his Studies, and indefatigable Vigilance. A great many People would take it ill, that I should dare to publish Apologies, and would say to me, if they durst speak their Mind, what Caligula said to his Brother. What? Do'st Thou take an Antidote against Cæsar (13)? I should seem to them worthy of a new Accusation, because I did not sink under the first." Quintus Scaevola, who was one of the noblest Men of his Time, was treated in the same manner; "Diem Scaevolæ dixit posteaquam compertum eum posse vivere: cum ab eo quaereretur quid tandem accusatoris esset eum, quem pro dignitate ne laudare quidem quilibet satis commodè posset, ajunt hominem (ut erat furiosus) respondisse, quod non totum telum corpore recepisset" (14). - - - - When he found Scaevola was out of Danger, he entered an Action, against him; and, being asked, what he had to alledge against a Person, whose Merit deserved the biggest Praise, the enraged Fellow is said to have replied, Because he did not receive the whole Weapon in his Body.

[G] He supported, in all his Writings, the Character of a fiery, and fowre, Spirit, which Petrarch had given him.] These are Petrarch's Words in his Apology: "Damnavit Bernardus Claraevallensis Abbas "Petrum was only designed to reclaim them from their detracting Temper (e). They, who have said, that he was of a small Stature, have misunderstood the Author they quote (f). At the bottom, the Reproaches of Heterodoxy, which he made to St Bernard, are meer Cavils, and serve only to shew, that, when a Man infits too rigidly on certain Expressions, without putting on That Spirit of Equity, which looks for the Sense of an Author in the Design, and Principles, of his Works, it is easy for him to discover Erroneous Propositions. I do not pretend, that all the Errors, imputed to Abeldard, have as bad a Foundation as This [H]; but it cannot be denied, as to the greatest part of them [I]; and therefore St Bernard's Friends had now just Reason to complain, that some Errors are found in his Works, by making use of his own Method against him. It is for the Advantage of the Public, that some Men should be obliged to cry out, (15) Pref.

Apolog. ad
Opera Abel-
dard.

[H] The Reproaches of Heterodoxy, which he made to St Bernard, are meer cavils. ----- The Errors imputed to Abeldard have not All as bad a Foundation as This.] For example, no wrong was done him, in accusing him of having too far extended the Power of Free-will, and the Necessity of Grace too little. He expressed himself so clearly upon This (16), that whoever should undertake to justify him, would imitate the Insincerity of Thofe, who, on other questions, maintain, that he was an Heretic. Neither must there be any cavilling about certain Articles, which it is difficult not to adopt, when once the Doctrine of Free-will is embraced. We may, therefore, say, that it is very true, that Abeldard had a great Indulgence for sins of Ignorance, and that he damned no body for Philosophical Sin (17). He seems also to me to have taught plainly, that JESUS CHRIST did not die to redeem us from the Tyranny of the Devil; but that the Love, which God shewed to Mankind by the Incarnation of his Son, should incline us to love him reciprocally; and to follow the Instructions, and the example, of an Incarnate God. This Doctrine is half Socinian, and, according to St Bernard, whoever maintains it deserves less to be confuted, than to be cudgelled. Annon justius eo loquens Italia fustibus tunderetur, quam rationibus refelleretur (18)? Here is another offensive Doctrine; viz. that Things, which never were, nor ever shall be, are not possible. This was, without doubt, Abeldard's Opinion (19); and I do not see, that They, who say, that God is determined by his Infinite Wisdom to do what is most worthy of himself, can consistently with themselves deny This Philosopher's Doctrine. See the Remark [M]. I omit some other Opinions, which might reasonably have been imputed to him, and which are either true, or indifferent to Religion.

[I] ----- but it cannot be denied as to the greatest Part of them.] This Assertion was falsely imputed to him: " Deus pater plena est potentia, Filius quaedam
" potentia, Spiritus Sanctus nulla potentia. ----- " God the FATHER is Full Power, The Son Some " Power, The HOLY GHOST No Power." They,
" who are most partial to St Bernard, own, that he did " not apprehend the Author's Opinion. " Abeldardi
" mentem affecit non videntur S. Bernardus, Abbas
" S. Theodorici, & Anonymus, qui ipsi tribuunt, &c.
" (20). ----- St Bernard, Abbot of S. Theodoric, and " an Anonymous Author, do not seem to have under" stood Abeldard's Meaning, when They impute to him,
" &c. Non ideo in Sabellianam aut Arianam hæ-
" resim impigit, non Trinitatem destruxit, non blas-
" phemiam dixit in Spiritum Sanctum, non Deorum
" novorum annuntiator fuit, ut maximi illi viri fer-
" vore disputationis abrepti ipsi improperarunt (21).
" ----- He was not a Sabellian, or an Arian, he did " not destroy the Trinity, he did not blaspheme against " the HOLY GHOST, he was not a setter forth of " new Gods, as these Great Men, carried away by " the Heat of Disputation, have hastily asserted." The Thing speaks of itself, when the whole Passage of Abeldard is examined. He was found a Heretic in these words: " Spiritus quamvis ejusdem substantie " sit cum patre & filio, unde etiam Trinitas $\mu\upsilon\sigma\omicron\varsigma\iota\varsigma$ -
" os, id est, unius substantie, prædicatur, minime
" tamen ex substantia patris aut filii, si proprie loqui-
" mur, esse dicendus est, quod oportet ipsum ex pa-
" tre vel filio gigni, sed magis ex ipso habet pro-
" cedere. ----- The Spirit, though he be of the same " Substance with the FATHER and the SON, whence
" the Trinity is said to be $\mu\upsilon\sigma\omicron\varsigma\iota\varsigma$, or Consubstan-
" tial, yet he must not be said to be of the Substance " of the FATHER and SON, properly speaking, be" cause he must be begotten of the FATHER or SON,
" or rather proceed from them." But, if the Laws
" of Equity had been ever so little followed, it might " have been apprehended, that he acknowledges the " Substance of That Doctrine, and that he has nothing
" Particular, but one of Those Abstractions of Logic,
" which will always be unavoidable by Thofe, who " will argue about the Difference of the Three Per" sons. He was charged with teaching that the HOLY " GHOST is the Soul of the World (22), and that " there is no sin, either in Action, or in the Will, or " in Lust, or in the Pleasure, which excites it, and " that we should not desire to stifle these things. He " maintains, in his Apology, that he had never said,
" nor wrote, such a Proposition (23). There is men" tion made of an Apology, which he published, where-
" in he partly denied the Propositions, that were ob" jected against him, as to the words, and altogether as " to the Sense. Ad Cluniacense Cænobium se contulit.
" Apologeticum scribens prædictorum capitulorum, partim
" verba, ex toto autem sensum negans (24).

The Mischief is, that the Event does not always prove prejudicial to the Aggressor; for we see, to this Day, the unfortunate Abelard covered with Shame and Ignominy [K], whilst his Adversary is invoked as a Saint. He had been condemned at Soissons, in a Council, where the Pope's Legate presided; which Legate understood nothing of the State of the Question [L]. Gerfon believed, that the famous Berengarius, who denied the Real Presence, was a Scholar of Peter Abelard (b); perhaps he took him for Him, who makes the Subject of This Article; however he is mistaken, since Abelard was not ten Years of Age, when the Adversary of the Real Presence died.

They, who would know more particularly, whether Berengarius had Reason to pretend, that Abelard was not an Heretic, who deserved the Persecutions, which were raised against him, will do well to consult Mr du Pin, who passes an equitable Judgment on This Man's Doctrine; and particularly on the fourteen Propositions extracted out of his Works, and read in the Council of Sens. It cannot be denied, says he (i), but that his Opinions concerning the Mystery of the Trinity were Oribodox, and that he believed the three Divine Persons to be of the same Nature. I shall set down all that he has said about this Proposition of Abelard; GOD cannot do but what he does [M]. It is a more important and difficult Question, than can be imagined. I shall

"que per malitiam vel ignorantiam prolutum est." Berengarius, his Apologist, denied it with more restriction. "Indiculum vidimus, in quo non Petri dogmata, sed nefandi commentarii capitula legimus. — Hæc & alia indiculum tuus continet, quorum quædam, fateor, Petrus & dixit & scripsit, quædam vero neque protulit neque scripsit. Quæ autem dixerit, & quæ non dixerit, & quam Catholica mente ea quæ dixerit fensit, secundum arcepti Operis prælatum Christiana disputatione ardentur & inipigrè declarabit (26). — I have seen an Index, in which I have read, not the Tenets of Peter, but Articles impudently invented. — Your Index contains These and Others, some of which, I confess, Peter both spoke, and wrote, and some he never either produced, or wrote. What he has said, and what he has not said, and with how Catholic a Disposition he conceived what he has said, The second Treatise of the Work, complained of, will warmly and zealously declare, in a Christian Disputation." Some accuse Abelard of having taught, that there are as many Heavens, as Days in the Year; and they add, that he was answered, That he supposed so great a number of them, that he might secure one, which would fit him (27). But this is rather Jesting than Disputing. It was, therefore, a very great Piece of Injustice to give the Cause for the Accuser, without knowing, whether the Accused acknowledged the Work, out of which These Propositions were extracted, for his own; whether he owned, that they were faithfully extracted; whether he understood them in the Accuser's Sense, &c. &c. And the Pope, who, from the Extracts, condemned the Books to be burnt, and Abelard to a Cloyster, without informing himself, whether Abelard taught those things, was more unjust, than the Synod of Sens. The Accuser's Letters, and the Messenger, whom he sent to the Court of Rome, and who said all that was necessary to make Abelard odious (28), completed the Oppression. Francis d'Amboise has described very lively the Part, which St Bernard acted in This whole Process. It was That of a Trumpeter sounding the Charge, and That of an Incendiary setting Fire to the Powder (29): since he sent to the Pope all the filth he could collect, and which ill-affected Peasants had gathered either out of his Adversary's Writings, or Lectures, or out of the Papers, which were published under his Name. And, therefore, I do not wonder, that Horsius inveighed against Francis d'Amboise (30); but I cannot tell whether he censured him for a thing, which deserved it; I mean for having said, that Peter the Venerable wrote to Innocent II, that Abelard, oppressed by the Vexations of some Men, who treated him as an Heretic, appealed to the Holy See. At Abelardum — gravatum vexationibus quorundam qui illi nomen hæretici quod vult abominabatur imponere volebant, Majestatem Apostolicam se appellasse. Whoever wrote thus to the Pope, plainly laid the Blame upon St Bernard; but This Business was not transacted in This Manner. Peter the Venerable said only, that Abelard gave out, he was persecuted. Quævisimus quo tenderet, gravatum se vexationibus, &c. Majestatem Apostolicam se appellasse respondit.

[K] We see, to this Day, the unfortunate Abelard covered with Shame and ignominy.] Thus he is charged to the end of the World with all the Errors, which were imputed to him in the Council of Sens, and with several others. Peter of Pergamo charges him with denying, that GOD is the Author of all Good, that he is a simple Being, that he alone is Eternal, and that every thing, which exists, is either Creator, or Creature (31). Bernard of Luxemburg ascribes the same Things to him, upon the Credit of the other. Prætelus has followed Bernard (32), and has been copied by the Jesuit Gaultier (33). Belleforest, and du Haillan, have done like Prætelus. The Writers of the Catalogues of Heretics, who like Sheep follow one another, Sanderus, Alphonfus de Castro, &c. have not failed to adopt these Accusations. But, on the other hand, They, who inserted him in the Catalogue of the Witnesses of the Truth (34), knew not what they did: He had indeed some particular Opinions about the Eucharistical Accidents; but it was rather in supposing the Real Presence, than in denying it.

[L] The Legate, who condemned him, understood nothing of the State of the Question.] After the Condemnation was pronounced, one of the Accusers muttered, that he had read in Abelard's Book, that GOD the Father is the Only Almighty (35). The Legate, having a very good Ear, heard it, and answered, that they ought not so much as to believe, that a Child was capable of falling into so great an Error, since, according to the common and public Faith, there are three Almighties. A Doctor, laughing at the Legate, could not forbear quoting these words of St Albanasus; Et tamen non tres omnipotentes, sed unus omnipotens. — And yet there are not Three Almighties, but One Almighty. His Bishop censured him for it; but he was boldly answered with a Passage of Daniel, concerning ignorant Judges, who deserve more to be condemned than Those, whom they judge. "Sic fatui filii Israël, non judicantes neque quod verum est cognoscentes condemnastis filium Israël. Revertimini ad iudicium, & de ipso judge iudicate." He added of his own; "qui talia iudicem quasi ad instructionem fidei & correctionem erroris instituitis, qui cum iudicare deberet, ore se proprio condemnavit. — Who have set up such a Judge, as it were for Instruction in the Faith, and Correction of Error, who, when he ought to have judged, condemned himself out of his own Mouth."

[M] Mr Du Pin's Judgment on This Proposition of Abelard, GOD cannot do but what he does.] Neither does he deny, that Power, Wisdom, and Love, are Attributes common to the three Divine Persons; nay he declares the contrary in express words: "but he attributes Power to the FATHER, Wisdom to the SON, and Love to the HOLY GHOST, by way of Appropriation; in which he does not seem to recede from the Doctrine of the Fathers and Divines. But he does not think, and speak, as others do, in the Third Proposition, wherein he maintains, that GOD cannot do but what he does, and cannot do all that he does not; not but that he acknowledges, that the Power of GOD in itself can extend to other Objects; but he pretends, that, being considered as joined to the Will and Will of GOD, he cannot will, or do any thing, but what he wills, and actually does (36)." You will see this more at large in the Substance, which Mr du shall add to this, that the Protestants are more inclined to condemn Abelard [N], than many Catholics are, and I shall quote a Passage of Mr Joly, a Canon of Notre Dame at Paris.

(37) Book III. of the Introduction to Divinity.

Pis has given of one of Abelard's Works (37). "In the third Book, he treats particularly of the Power of God; and he maintains, that God can do but what he does, and cannot do all that he does not, because God can do but what he will: now he cannot have the Will to do any thing but what he does, because he does necessarily will all that is fit to be done; from whence it follows, that, whatever he does not, is not fit to be done; that he cannot have the Will to do it; and consequently that he cannot do it. He himself confesses, that this Opinion is peculiar to him; that scarce any body else approves of it; that it seems contrary to the Doctrine of the Saints, and to Reason, and to derogate from the greatness of God. Hereupon he raises a difficult Objection against himself: A Reprobate, says he, may be saved; but he cannot be saved except God saves him: therefore God can save him, and consequently do something, which he does not. He answers, that it may be said indeed, that this Man may be saved, as to the Possibility of human Nature, which is capable of Salvation; but that it cannot be said, that God can save him, with relation to God himself, because it is impossible, that God should do what he ought not to do: He explains this by divers Examples: A Man that speaks may hold his Tongue; but a Man that does actually speak cannot be silent: the Voice may be heard, but a deaf Man cannot hear it: a Field may be manured, though a Man cannot manure it, &c (38)."

(38) Du Pin, ibid. Tom. IX, pag. 219, 220.

I may perhaps examine this Doctrine in one of the Remarks on the Article WICLIFFE.

[N] The Protestants are more inclined to condemn Abelard than many Catholics. "Hornbeck, at the beginning of his Apparatus ad controversias & dissertationes Socinianas, observes Abelard's Heresies. "Perizonius in his Specimen Apologeticum anti-Gualterianum (39) accusationibus Jacobi Gualterii Jesuitæ oppositum, in his fifth Defence, de fide implicita, gives likewise an ample Description of Abelard, and of his Opinions, and shews at large, Pontificios, & nominatim Jesuitas, in multis cum Abelardo convenire: — that the Roman Catholics, and particularly the Jesuits, agree in many things with Abelard. He draws a Parallel between them, and shews, in another Place of That fifth

(39) This is an Anti-Gualterian, omitted by Mr Baillet.

Defence, Quàm pulchrè Sociniani præluxerit, minime obscurum est: — — — — that it is well known how he prepared the way to Socinianism. Beckmannus, in his Theological Exercitations, Exercit. 2 says, that, Socinus hunc errorem, Christum pro peccatis nostris non esse mortuum, è lacunis veterum hausit; quippe, anno Christi 1140, in Gallis Petrus Abailardus (quem Bernardus & Otho Frisingensis Abailardum, Platina Baillardum, vocant) idem docuit (40). — — — — Socinus borrowed This Error (that Christ did not die for our Sins) from the Ancients; since, in the Year 1140, Peter Abelard (whom Bernard and Otho of Frisingen call Abailard, and Platina Baillard) taught the same in France. Joly, a Canon of Notre Dame at Paris — — — — says, in his Treatise of the Restitutions of Great Men, That Abelard's Enemies, being jealous of his Reputation, did so much impose upon St Bernard, who proceeded honestly in the matter, that we find, that the Book of the Sentences was condemned to be burnt under the Name of Abelard, as being the Author of it; though it was of Peter Lombard, Bishop of Paris: a Work, nevertheless, adds he, which is known to be canonized in the Sorbonne; and on which all the Scholastic Divinity is founded. He says again, That the same Abelard was very much abused and persecuted by the Monks of St Denis in France, and by St Gildas (41) of Ruys, near Vannes, in Bretagne; because he reproved their Vices (42)."

(41) He Joss. A. has a Just, and by those of St Gildas.

(42) Anellon, ubi supra, pag. 4.

I shall observe two things, upon This Passage of Mr Anellon: the one is, that, in effect, Abelard's Opinions, about the Doctrine of Grace, are much the same with Those, which the Jesuits maintain. But Mr du Pin observes, that, if This Author's Doctrine "be not conformable to St Augustin's Doctrine — — — — neither is it Pelagian, nor Semipelagian, "since he acknowledges the Necessity of Grace for the beginning of good Actions, and maintains only, that God has given an equal Grace to all Men, whereof every one may make a good use, or reject it (43)." The second thing I have to observe, is, that I shall enquire, in another place, whether the Book of the Sentences, condemned to be burnt under the Name of Abelard, be That of Peter Lombard.

(43) Du Pin, ubi supra, pag. 125.

BERENICE, the Name of several Women and Cities. We shall speak of some of These Women; and, as to the Cities, we shall only observe, that Ortelius reckons nine of them, and that the two chief were in Africa, one in Pentapolis, and the other in the Red-Sea. The latter received This Name in honour of Berenice, the Mother of Ptolomy Philadelphus (a), and the other in honour of Berenice, the Wife of Ptolomy, the Third of That Name (b). Berenice is a Greek Name [A].

[A] Berenice is a Greek Name. It was formed from That of Βερενίκη, that is to say, Victory-Braver, by the Macedonians, who changed Pb. into B. See Plutarch (1), and Steph. Byzantinus (2). Hence it is, that some Authors call Her Pbernice, whom others call Berenice. There are some, who, instead of Berenice, say, in Latin, Beronice.

(1) Plutarch. in Cuest. Græcis 293, E.

BERENICE, Daughter, Sister, and Mother, of some Persons, who carried the Prize at the Olympian Games (a), obtained, by reason of such Singularity, leave to assist at Those Games, which had been forbidden other Women, by a public Decree [A]. Some say she obtained This Privilege, before her Son was Victor [B].

(a) Un Berenice, que filia fortis, mater Olympionicarum. Plinius lib. 7, c. 21. Editio Harduini, quæ juxta MSS. omnes habet Berenice, cum libris editi habent Pterene.

[A] She obtained the Privilege of assisting at the Olympic Games; which had been forbidden Women by a public Decree. This Prohibition supposes, that They did not trust to the Suggestions of Decency and natural Modesty. The Champions were stark naked; which alone ought to have banished the fair Sex from These Shows: Nevertheless, They did not rely upon This: Laws were made, and published, to forbid Women the Sight of These Exercises. Thus far there was no harm in it: They were sensible of the great Power of Curiosity: But who would not condemn the extrem and cruel Rigour of These new Legislators? They ordered, that, if any Woman was surprized in These As-semblies, or if she passed the River during That Time, she should be thrown headlong from the Top of a Hill (1). It is no wonder, that no Woman suffered this terrible Punishment (2). The Sight of some naked Men could not be a Charm, or Allurement, strong enough to make them blind to so great Danger; and, if there was found a Woman, who did not observe this Prohibition, it was because she thought she ran no hazard; for she was disguised in Man's Apparel, and did not think, that a single Leap would betray her. She was probably overjoyed to see her Son come off Conqueror, that she threw herself a little too merrily over the Barrier: Nay, how do we know, but that her Cloaths caught in through the Enemy's Troops, to the House, where she believed her Son's Body was hid. This we find in Valerius Maximus (a). There is some Probability, that This Author has confounded what relates to two different Persons. The Commentators are puzzled about it [A]. See the Remark.

(a) Valer. Maxim. lib. ix. cap. 10. lib. fin.

FAULTS of Olivarius, the Commentator on Valerius Maximus.

[A] Valerius Maximus has confounded what relates to two different Persons. The Commentators are puzzled about it. Olivarius, who wrote long Notes on Valerius Maximus, full of trivial Erudition, pretends, that the Berenice in question was also called Laodice, and that she was Sister of Mitridates, who waged such a long War with the Romans. Whereupon, he relates, that This Lady was first married to Ariarathes, King of Cappadocia; that her second Husband was Nicomedes, King of Bitbynia; and that the two Sons, which he had by Ariarathes, having been killed by Mitridates, the one immediately, and the other mediately, she armed herself, and pursued Cæneus, who had executed the Order of Mitridates, and punished him, as Valerius Maximus relates. I observe, against This, I. That Valerius Maximus was so far from intending to speak of a Woman, whose Name was Berenice, or Laodice, that he remarks, that Laodice caused the Son of Berenice to be killed. II. The first Part indeed of our Commentator's Narrative is to be found in Justin (1); but we do not find there, that the Sister of Mitridates, who was the Wife of Ariarathes, and of Nicomedes, had any other Name, than That of Laodice. III. We do not find there, that the second Son of Ariarathes and Laodice was killed by Order of Mitridates; we find, on the contrary, that he died of Sickness. Nec multo post adelesens ex ægritudine collecta infirmitate decessit (2). IV. The latter Part of This Narrative is manifestly contradicted by Justin: See in what manner he relates, that Laodice endeavoured to revenge herself of her Brother, after having lost her two Sons. Nicomedes, her second Husband, suborned a very handsome Youth, to make it believed, that there remained yet a third Son of Ariarathes, and sent Laodice to Rome with Orders to testify, that Ariarathes had left three Sons, whereof the last was yet living, and demanded his Father's Kingdom of the Romans. It is too bold to advance several Facts, with their Circumstances, without being able to cite Authorities for them. Where did Olivarius read, that the Sister of Mitridates mounted on a Chariot, and pursued Cæneus, the Murderer of her second Son? I shall observe, by the way, that Freinbemi had no reason to accuse Justin of contradicting himself, or of confounding History prodigiously (3). Justin spoke of two Laodices, married to two Ariarathes's. The first killed five of her Children, after the Death of her Husband, and would have killed the sixth, the only one that remained, if her Relations had not prevented it (4). The People got rid of This furious Woman. The second Laodice married That Son of Ariarathes, who was the only remaining one. This will plainly appear in another Place (5). I wish Justin was guilty of no other Confusions, and Contradictions.

Father Cantel observes, that Olivarius was in the wrong to ascribe the Action, which Valerius Maximus relates, to Mitridates's Sister. He believes, that Valerius Maximus meant Berenice, and Laodice, Wives of Antiochus Theus, and both Daughters of Ptolomy Philadelphus. It is not universally agreed, that they were Sisters: Polyænus, quoted by one of Father Cantel's Fraternity (6), says, that Laodice, the Wife of Antiochus Theus, was her Husband's Sister, and Daughter of Antiochus Soter. As for Berenice, the other Wife of Antiochus Theus, it is generally agreed, that she was the Daughter of Ptolomy Philadelphus. Nevertheless, Father Cantel is not to be condemned; he has Appian's Authority for what he says (7). He has some reason to believe, that Valerius Maximus meant the Wives of Antiochus Theus; but he should have censured him for having made an Addition to the sad Fate of Berenice. The Valour, which That Author ascribes to his Berenice, and her good Success, mentioned by him, against her Son's Murderer, do not agree with the Wife of Antiochus; for she was so far from being able to revenge her Son's Death, that she was cruelly murdered, with him, in the Place, whither she had fled. But it is true, that it was one Laodice, who was the cause of This Misfortune (8). But, since Father Cantel believed, that the Author, whom he commented, had the History of the Wives of Antiochus Theus in view, he should not have marked the Six hundred sixty fourth Year of Rome in the Margin: This Chronology differs too much from That, which belongs to These two Princesses (9).

BERENICE, Daughter of Ptolomy Auletes, King of Egypt, succeeded her Father before his Death. I do not find, that she excited the Egyptians to expel him (a); and there is some probability, that they were inclined, of themselves, to get rid of a troublesome Yoke, without being animated to it by Her: But it is certain, that, as soon as the Father was driven out, the Daughter was crowned [A]. This banished Prince implored the Assistance of the Romans, and obtained, at last, that Gabinus, Governor of Syria, should endeavour to restore him. Pompey performed it; for the People of Rome, relying on some Verses of the Sybil, would not concern themselves with This Re-establishment. On the other side, Berenice did her utmost Endeavours to maintain herself on the Throne; and, though she feared the Romans, she made no Proposals of Accommodation to her Father, nor shewed him any Civility (b). And, believing that a Husband would be of great Use to her, she invited a Prince, whose Name was Seleucus, descended from the Kings of Syria, and shared with him her Bed, and her Scepter. She was soon weary of him, not finding him a Man of any Merit; and caused him to be killed (c). Afterwards she cast her Eyes on Archelaus, the Son of him, who had forsaken the Party of Mitridates, to

[A] As soon as the Father was driven out, the Daughter was crowned. Strabo observes, that That Prince had three Daughters, and that the eldest, who was legitimate, was placed on the Throne (1). This Narrative is not exact, if it be supposed, that Porphyr gave a true Account of This Revolution: for he affirms, that Cleopatra, or Tryphene, and Berenice, Daughters of Ptolomy, reigned together, the first Year of their Father's Flight, and that, Tryphene being dead, her Sister Berenice reigned two Years alone (2). This shews, that Berenice was not the eldest, and confirms my Opinion, that she did not plot to dethrone the King: The Suspicion rather falls on her Sister Tryphene. I do not pretend to deny, that it is possible Ambition might prompt them to favour the Malecontents, and open a way to the Throne for themselves, by the Deposition of their Father; I pretend only, that the ancient Books do not contain this Fact. Mr Baudet maintains the contrary (3); but I am certain, that, if what he alleges out of Dis Cassius, Porphyr, and Photius, be examined, his Opinion will not be found to be confirmed thereby. His strongest Allegation is, that Ptolomy, stifling all fatherly Affection, caused his Daughter Berenice to be put to Death for what she had done. It is plain, that, without making her an Accomplice in the Revolt of the Egyptians, one may think she was guilty enough in her Father's Judgment, by considering only, that she accepted the Crown, and used all manner of means to maintain her Usurpation.

join with Sylla. She offered herself to him in Marriage [B], and promised him, that he should share in her Royalty. He was, then, in Gabinus's Army; and he might easily have been hindered from going to Berenice, if Gabinus had not rather, for his particular Interest, given him the Liberty to marry That Princess [C]. Archelaus married her, and put himself at the Head of Her Army to repel the Romans, who pretended to restore King Ptolomy. He was slain in Battle; Ptolomy re-entered Alexandria, and caused his rebellious Daughter to be put to death without Mercy (d). Such was the Fate of Berenice. A modern Author has very well unfolded the Intrigues

[B] She offered herself to Archelaus in Marriage.] I have reason to say This; but Father Noris had no reason to say it. "Archelaus à Berenice spe nuptiarum Alexandriam evocatus, eadem uxore ducta, copias contra Gabinium ducens, victus prælio occubuit, mense regni sexto, ex Strabone, lib. 12. pag. 385 (4). ----- Archelaus, being invited to Alexandria by Berenice, upon an Offer of Marriage, after having wedded her, lead an Army against Gabinus, and fell in Battle, in the sixth Month of his Reign, according to Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 385." Had I had no other Author to quote but Strabo, I would not have said, as Father Noris did, that Berenice gained him, by a Promise of Marriage. I do not find in Strabo, that That Princess had any Thought of Archelaus; I find only that the Egyptians, having expelled their King Ptolomy, fought for a Prince of the Royal Blood, to marry him to Berenice, and that Archelaus, knowing this, offered himself to them, under the supposed Quality of the Son of Mitridates Eupator, and was accepted, and reigned six Months. Ταύτην ζητούντων ἀνδρὶς βασιλικῆς γένους ἐνέχουσιν αὐτὴν τοῖς συμκρηάταισι, πεποινσαμένῳ Μιθριδάτῃ τῷ Εὐπάτορῳ υἱὸς εἶναι, καὶ παρὰ τῶνδε, ἐβασίλευσεν ἔξ ἡμῶν (5). Et cum quaeretur maritus regio sanguine natus, de diti je Archelaus auxiliarius fuit, simulavitque se filium esse Mitridatis Eupatoris, itaque receptus sex menses regno potitus est. This affords us an Example of the great Care, with which a Writer ought to relate what he finds in Authors. The least Liberty, he takes, is sufficient sometimes to injure a Person's Honour. It is not decent, or becoming the Dignity of a Queen, to offer herself in Marriage, and to enice a young Man by the Hopes of marrying her. It belongs to her Subjects to procure a suitable Match for her; which is the Account Strabo gives in relation to Berenice. The Case should not therefore have been represented as Father Noris has done it, or else he should have quoted other Authors, than Strabo. If Dio had been quoted, Berenice might have been decried as a Princess, who, after having usurped the Throne of Him, to whom she owed her Life, went in quest of an Husband, and offered herself, and her Crown, as a Price of the Protection she stood in need of. See the following Remark.

[C] Gabinus, who could have hindered him from going to Berenice, chose to let him espouse This Princess.] Gabinus presently discovered Archelaus's Design, and secured him; which might have put an end to The Business: But, fearing he should not find Difficulty enough in the restoring Ptolomy to have room to demand all the Sums, which That Prince had promised, he ordered the matter so, that his Re-establishment met with some Obstacles. In this View, he found no better Expedient, than to suffer Archelaus to put himself at the Head of the Rebels. Archelaus passed for a Man of Courage, and had a great Reputation: To drive him from Alexandria seemed a great Exploit to Gabinus, for which he might honourably demand great Rewards from Ptolomy. Besides, Gabinus did not release his Prisoner, till he had extorted a great Sum from him (6): So that he took Money on all Hands, that is of both Parties. A notable Instance of the Tricks that are paid to Sovereigns. Sometimes one Campaign would end a War, if Generals, for their private Advantage, did not dexterously supply the Enemy with an After-game. Take notice, they were obliged to spread a Report, that Archelaus had made his Escape (7). Gabinus, being well paid for the leave he had given him to escape, pretended, without doubt, to be angry with Those, who kept him. A new Scene of The Comedy! But I observe, that Strabo knew nothing of all this Management of Gabinus. He says, that Archelaus was brought to Berenice, without Gabinus's Privacy. λαβὼν δὲ τὸν κοιζέσαι διὰ τινὸς (οἱ τίνων) εἰς τὴν βασιλισσαν, καὶ ἀναδείκνυνται βασιλεῖς. Εὐ (Gabinio) nesciente, per amicos quosdam ad Reginam deductus, rex declaratus fuit (8). Thus he frees that Roman General from a great Reproach. Strabo clears Berenice in great Measure, and induces us to believe, that she was not guilty of her Father's Expulsion. He says plainly, that That Prince was expelled by the Inhabitants of Alexandria, who afterwards set the Eldest of his three Daughters on the Throne, and caused one Cybiastes to come from Syria, who pretended to be descended from the Kings of Syria, and gave him the Queen in Marriage. She, being displeased with the Benefits she observed in him, caused him to be strangled a few Days after. It is said, that he caused Alexander's Body to be put into a Glass Coffin, to appropriate to himself That massy Gold, out of which he took it. I have read this Fact in a Modern Writer, who quotes Strabo and Suetonius, two Authors, who say not a word of it (9). The latter says in general, that That Prince was sorely avaricious. "Alexandri Cybiastes eum" (Vespasianum) vocare perleverant, cognomine "unius è regibus suis turpissimum fordidum (10). ----- The Inhabitants of Alexandria continued to "nick-name Vespasian Cybiastes, from one of their Kings, who was most sordidly covetous." Τὸν μὲν ἐν δαίγων ἡμερῶν ἀπετραγαλλισεν ἡ Βασιλισσα, ἡ φέρουσα τὸ θάνατον αὐτῇ καὶ τὸ ἀνελευθερῆναι: They are Strabo's Words: Hunc intra paucos dies regina strangulevit, cum ejus sordes illiberalitateque pati non posset (11).

You will tell me, that, in the foregoing Page, That Writer mentions one Ptolomy, who being come from Syria, had carried off The golden Urn, but drew no profit from This Action, being soon overthrown: But how do you know, that This is to be understood of Berenice's Husband? Do you not see, that Strabo gives only the Title of Cybiastes to the latter, and that he gives the Name of Ptolomy, and the Surname of Coccus, and Parisæus, to the other? Ἐγύλας δ' αὐτὴν ὁ Κόκκῃς καὶ Παρισαῖος ἐπικαλεῖται Πτολεμαῖος: aureum Ptolemaeus cognomento Coccus & subditius rapuit (12). Do you not know, that Dion calls Him, that was married to Berenice, Seleucus (13)? Can it be believed, that, if Strabo had pretended to speak of the same Man, in the Five hundred forty sixth, and Five hundred forty seventh Pages, he would have expressed himself as he does? There is no Word, or Phrase, in his Narrative, which insinuates, that the Syrian, who carried away the golden Tomb, is the same Cybiastes, whom Berenice put to Death. Nevertheless, read the learned Reflexions of Mr Baudelot, who believes, as well as the Abbot de St Real, that Cybiastes, and Ptolomy Coccus, are one and the same Person (14).

[D] Archelaus was slain in Battle.] This does not agree with the seventeenth Book of Strabo, where we read, that Ptolomy, being re-established in his Kingdom, caused his Daughter, and his Son-in-law Archelaus, to be put to Death. Καταχθεὶς ὑπὸ Γαβίνῳ Πτολεμαῖος, τὸν τε Ἀρχέλαον ἀναρεῖ καὶ τὴν θυγατέρα. Ptolemaeus, à Gabinio reductus, Archelaum ac Filium interimit (15). But I had rather depend on the twelfth Book of Strabo, than on the seventeenth; because Plutarch plainly confirms, what Strabo relates in the twelfth Book, that Archelaus was slain in Battle. Τὸν μὲν ἐν ὁ Γαβίνος ἀνέλεν ἐν παραστάξει, κατὰ τὸν τὸν Πτολεμαῖον. Eum Gabinus Ptolemaeus reducens in pugna occidit (16). Plutarch sets forth, that Marc Antony performed several courageous Actions in Gabinus's Army, when Ptolomy was re-established, and that he did likewise an Act of Humanity, which was much praised; namely, that he caused the Body of his Friend Archelaus to be fought for, and made a splendid Funeral for him. Is not this a Proof, that Archelaus trigues, which were carried on at Rome, for the Re-establishment of Ptolomy; but he is mistaken as to the Circumstances of Archelaus's Detention [E].

Archelaus was killed in Battle? Γεγονός γὰρ αὐτῷ συνίθης καὶ ξυῖοι ἀπολέμεται μὲν ἀνταγώνιστος ἑστῆ, τὸ δὲ σώμα περὶ τὸν ἔθρονον, καὶ κομμοῦσας βασιλικὰς ἐκείνου. Nam quum familiaritas ei cum illo & jus hospitii intercessisset, bellum cum vi-vente gessit necessario, corpus interfecit requisitum regio cultu funeravit (17). Dio Cassius relates the matter in such a manner, as plainly shows, that Archelaus was killed in the Fight, which decided the Quarrel between the Father and the Daughter, and that, after That Victory of Gabinus, the Egyptians were obliged to open the Gates of Alexandria to Ptolomy, who caused Berenice and divers others to be put to Death.

[E] A Modern Author — is mistaken as to the Circumstances of Archelaus's Detention.] The Modern Author, whom I mean, is the Abbot de Saint Real. See the Cesarion, which he published in the Year 1685. The Mistake, which I design to take notice of, consists in his supposing, that Archelaus departed privately from Gabinus to marry the Queen of Egypt (18); and that, being taken Prisoner in a Battle, after the Romans had made themselves Masters of Pelufum, Gabinus gave him the Assistance, which was necessary for his Escape, upon paying a great Ransom (19). Dio Cassius, whom he quotes, says, in express Words, that Gabinus let Archelaus escape, before the Army marched towards Pelufum, and before there was any Battle (20).

BERENICE, Daughter of Cosobarus, and Salome, Sister of Herod the Great [A], was first married to Aristobulus, Son of the same Herod, and of Mariamne, and lived unhappily enough with him; for, because he had a Brother married to the Daughter of Archelaus, King of Cappadocia, he often upbraided Berenice with having unmatched himself in marrying her, and that, in so doing, he had made himself much inferior to his Brother. Berenice, all in Tears, reported these, and other Discourses, to her Mother, and incensed her greatly: Infomuch, that Salome, who had a great Power over Herod, made him jealous of Aristobulus, and was the chief Cause that induced That cruel Father to make away with him (a). Though Berenice had five Children (b), she married again with a Brother of Antipater's Mother; which Antipater was Herod's Son. Having lost This second Husband, she went to Rome, and gained the Esteem of Augustus: But, above all, she insinuated herself into the Favour of Antonia, the Wife of Drusus [B], which, afterwards, stood her Son Agrippa in good stead. The first time the latter went to Rome, his Mother Berenice was yet living [C]; but, the second time he went thither, she was dead.

[A] She was Daughter of Cosobarus, and of Salome, Sister of Herod the Great. Josephus says so in express Words: It is, therefore, through want of Memory, that Dr Montague questions, whether it was ever determined, that Berenice was the Daughter of Cosobarus, or of Joseph. Quam (Berenice filiam Salomes) vel à Cosobaro vel Josepho, nam non minime pro certo traditum, genuerat (1). Cornelius à Lapide believed falsely, that Herod was the Father of our Berenice (2).

[B] She insinuated herself into the Favour of Antonia. There is a Passage in Strabo, which deserves to be produced. Καίσαρ καὶ τῆς ἡς ἐτιμῆς τῷ Ἡρώδῃ καὶ τῇ ἀδελφῇ Σαλώμῃ, καὶ τὴν ταύτης θυγατέρα Βερενίκην: That is; The Emperor honoured the Sons of Herod, and his Sister Salome, and Berenice, the Daughter of Salome (3). It is probable, these two Women went together to Rome, to dispute the Kingdom of Judea with Archelaus, the Son of Herod; for it is known, that Salome went thither, at That Time, with her Family (4).

[C] The first time Agrippa went to Rome, his Mother Berenice was yet living. For we read, in Josephus, that Agrippa lived familiarly with Drusus, the Son of Tiberius; and that he acquired the Friendship of Antonia, the Wife of Drusus, the Brother of Tiberius, by reason of the Esteem, which Antonia had for Berenice, the Mother of Agrippa (5). That Historian adds, that Agrippa, out of respect to his Mother, restrained his Natural Inclination, which prompted him to be lavish of his Fortune; but that, after her Death, he was so prodigal, that he quite exhausted it. Having neither Money nor Credit left, he returned to Judea, from whence, after divers Adventures, he came back to Rome, and went to salute Tiberius in the Island of Capree. He was, at first, very well received by him; but he had, afterwards, good need of Antonia's Protection. I do not know, where Noldius had read, that Berenice died at Antonia's House (6).

BERENICE, Grand-daughter of the foregoing, and Daughter of Agrippa, the first of That Name, King of Judea, was much talked of on account of her Amours. She was betrothed to one Marc, the Son of Alexander Lysimachus, Alabarche; but he died before the Marriage was consummated. A little after, she was married to her Uncle Herod, who, at the Request of Agrippa, both his Brother, and Father-in-law, was made King of Chalcis, by the Emperor Claudius (a). She was but sixteen Years of Age, when her Father died (b). She lost her Husband in the eighth Year of the Emperor Claudius (c), and behaved very ill in her Widowhood; for the general Opinion was, that she committed Incest with her Brother Agrippa. To put a stop to These Reports, she endeavoured to marry again, and offered herself to Polemon, King of Cilicia, provided he would change his Religion (d). It will easily be believed, that she required this Condition rather out of Vanity, or Policy, than out of Zeal; but it is no uncommon thing for a zealous, and amorous, Woman to set up for a Converter. Polemon, having more Regard to the Riches, than the Reputation, of the Lady, who courted him, accepted her Offers, caused himself to be circumcised, and married her: And, if he did not continue all his Life-time in the Bonds of This Marriage, it was not his own Fault, but That of Berenice; since This lewd Woman left him, and returned whither she pleased [A]. [A] This lewd Woman left Polemon, her Husband, and returned whither she pleased. I shall here transcribe A Passage, which is full of Faults. That Berenice, of whom our Xiphilinus makes mention, was the Daughter of Archelaus, and the Wife of Herod, after whose Death, she married Polemon King of Lycia, whom she left, propter nimietatem coitus, ut quidam dixerunt, says Josephus, lib. 20. cap. 2. This is what she retained only the Title of the Emperor's Mistress, or Concubine. In the XVIIth Century, the French Stage resounded with the Amours of Titus and Berenice [D]. She had too beautiful a Sister for them to love each other [E]. The Holy Scripture makes mention of Berenice [F]. Great Mistakes have been committed in relation to This Princess.

she was in her greatest Lustre at Forty four Years of Age. This was enough to expose her to Envy. Suetonius observes, that the Separation was with Regret on both sides. "Nec minus libido (suspensa erat in Titus) propter exoletorum & spadonum greges, propterque insignem reginæ Berenices amorem, cui etiam nuptias pollicitus ferebatur. --- Berenice statim ab urbe dimisit invitum invitam (12). --- Nor was Titus left suspected of Lust, on account of the many Catamites and Eunuchs, as also from his remarkable Love for Berenice, to whom he is said to have promised Marriage. --- He immediately dismissed Berenice from the City, to the great Regret of both." Titus did himself great Violence in sending away Berenice, to put a stop to the Complaints of Slanderers. Berenice was much vexed at being sent away: no doubt she would rather have suffered the Continuance of Calumny: And, if it be true, that Titus had promised her Marriage, as was reported, we may very well believe, that she loudly exclaimed against the Unfaithfulness of Men. It is probable, that, to moderate her Grief, Titus represented to her, that it was a Sacrifice he was obliged to make to the Murmurs of the whole City; but that, after having given way to This Torrent for a while, they should meet again. It is certain, that Berenice behaved, as if she had been sent away in this manner: Some time after she returned to Titus; but she got nothing by it; for he would not hear of her any more. I believe, Xiphilinus is the only Historian, who has observed, that Berenice was sent away twice, the first time in the Reign of Vespasian, and the second in That of Titus. Ο δε δὴ Τίτος ἔδδεν ἔτε φωνῶν ὅτι ἐρωτικὸν μοναρχίῃς ἔβραζε, ἀλλὰ χρεὶς καί τινος ἐπιβουλῆς, καὶ σφῶν καί τοι καὶ τῆς Βερνίκης ἐς Ρώμην αὐτῆς ἐλθόντι, ἐγύετο (13). Titus, from the Time that he became sole Emperor, neither committed Slaughter, nor was a Slave to Love; but was courteous, though plotted against; and chaste, though Berenice was returned to the City. Xiphilinus probably is not mistaken, that Aurelius Victor, and the other Historians, mention but one Dismissal. "Ut subit pondus regium, Berenice nuptias suas sperantem regredi domum --- præcepit (14). --- When he had taken upon him the Royal Authority, he commanded Berenice, who was in Hopes of being married to him, to return home." These Words of Aurelius Victor, compared with what he had said before, convict him of extreme Negligence. He says, here, that Berenice was in hopes of marrying Titus, and he had said, just before, that she was his Wife. "Cœcina nam Consularem, adhibuit cœnæ, vix dum tricinio egressum, ob suspicionem stupratæ Berenices uxoris suæ, jugulari iussit. --- Cœcina, of Consular Dignity, whom he had invited to his Table, had scarce left it, when, by the Emperor's Order, he was put to Death, on Suspicion of having violated his Wife Berenice." Let us infer from hence, that Berenice lent an Ear to other Lovers, besides the Emperor. This is common enough in the Mistresses of great Princes. I cannot pass over an Error of Noldius. He says, in Page 408, that Dio Cassius, or Xiphilinus, are mistaken in placing Berenice's Divorce under the Reign of Vespasian, since Aurelius Victor affirms, that Titus did not send her away, till after he had taken Possession of the Crown. Ut subit Pondus Regium (15). This Noldius says, Page 408; but, at Page 409, he affirms, that Berenice returned to Rome, to make a new Attempt on Titus's Heart, and that her Design miscarried. He quotes Xiphilinus for This. What! After having said, that an Author is mistaken, should we affirm what he advances? Should we prove it by his Testimony?

[D] In the XVIIth Century, the French Stage resounded with the Amours of Titus and Berenice. Two Pieces, entitled Berenice, were acted at the same time: One was composed by Cornille, and the other by Racine: each of them had it's Partizans: The Abbot de Villars published some Critical Observations on both. I should not have known, that he is the Author of Those Observations, if I had not read these Words in the Sentimens de Cleanthe (16). "Would you have questioned it, if you had recollected the Critic on the two Berenices? --- For what reason should we have escaped That Critic on two excellent Poets, one of whom did not vouchsafe to answer him, and the other declared, in but two Words, why he did not answer him (17)?"

Here are some Extracts, which seem to me worthy of the Place I give them. "I am very sorry, says a Lady, writing to the Count de Rabutin, that I cannot send you the Berenice of Racine, this Day; I expect it from Paris, and I am sure it will please you; but, for that Purpose, you must have a refined Tenderness; for no Woman ever carried Love and Delicacy so far as she does. Good God! What a pretty Mistress! And what pity it is, that a single Character cannot make a good Piece: Racine's Tragedy would be perfect (18)." The Count answered her: "I have just now read Berenice. I do not find so much Tenderness in it, as I expected. I remember, that, when I pretended to have some, I could have out-done Berenice: Titus does not seem to me to love her: so much as he says, since he uses no Endeavours, in her favour, with the Senate, and the People of Rome. He yields immediately to the Remonstrances of Paulinus, who, finding him shaken, brings the People, and Senate, of Rome, to engage him; whereas, if he had spoken resolutely to Paulinus, he would have found every one ready to submit to his Will. I would have done so myself; and, by this means, I should have joined Love and Glory together. As for Berenice, if I had been in her Place, I would have done as she did, that is, I would have left Rome full of Rage against Titus; but Antiochus should not have been the better for it (19)." Here is the Reply, that was made to him. "Your Heart is not so indifferent as I believed it to be, since you remember still, that you could have out-done Berenice in Point of Tenderness, and you must have carried it to a very high Pitch, to have surpassed her: I commend, and esteem, you for it. He, who pretends to Love, must not do it by halves (20)." From these three Passages, we learn, what Judgment was passed on Mr Racine's Berenice, and how much the Ladies are naturally inclined to approve of Those Hearts, which have the utmost Tenderness. I do not find, that the Count de Rabutin's Criticism is well grounded; for he would have had the Poet falsify an Event, which ought to be preserved on the Stage. Berenice's Dismissal is so well known in History, that they, who had not found it in the Tragedy, might justly have exclaimed against the Author. Without doubt, Mr Racine foresaw this; and it is probable this was the Reason, why he represented Titus's Passion inferior to That of the Lady: This might displease the Fair Sex; but the Author found, that this Inconvenience did not equal the other.

[E] She had too beautiful a Sister, for them to love each other. Josephus observes, that Drusilla, the Sister of Berenice, listened to the Proposals of Felix, Governor of Judæa, to secure herself from her Sister's Jealousy, who could not endure, that she (Drusilla) should be so beautiful. Drusilla was courted by Felix, whilst she was married to Azizus, King of Emesenes. She yielded, and married Felix, and the even seems to have abjured the Jewish Religion (21). The Hatred of Brothers is great; and some Maxims might be quoted upon this Subject; but, if I am not mistaken, the Hatred of Sisters exceeds it. We may touch upon this in some other Place (22).

[F] The Holy Scripture makes mention of Berenice. We find, in the Twenty fifth Chapter of the Acts, that Agrippa and Berenice came to Cæsarea, to salute Festus, and that, having been told of St Paul, who was then in Prison, they had a mind to hear him; and that, for this Purpose, they went to the Place of Audience, with great Pomp (23), and heard St Paul.

Princes [G]. I could not take notice of all the Queens, who have born this Name. I shall remark some Errors of Moreri [H], Hofman, Charles Stephens, &c. [I].

[G] Great Mistakes have been committed in relation to This Princess.] Sabellicus believed, that she was the Wife of Aristobulus, and afterwards of Antipater (24). This is to confound two Berenices, viz. the Grand-mother, and the Grand-daughter, together: The former was married, the first time, to Aristobulus, and, the second time, to an Uncle of Antipater, and not to Antipater himself. This is, then, a second Mistake of Sabellicus. As for the Berenice, whom he speaks of (the Mistress of Titus) she had neither of These two Husbands. I shall set down a Passage of Juvenal, which is, doubtless, to be understood of the latter Berenice, who was beloved by Titus, and who was suspected of Incest with her Brother Agrippa;

Grandia tolluntur crystallina; maxima rursus
Myrrhina, deinde adamas notissimus, & Berenices
In digito factus pretiosior: hunc dedit olim
Barbarus incestæ, dedit hunc Agrippa forori,
Et versutus ubi festa mero pede sabbata Reges,
Et venter indulget senibus clementia porcis (25).

*Rich Chrystals of the Rock she takes up there,
Huge Agat Vases, and old China Ware:
Then Berenice's Ring her Finger proves,
More precious made by her incestuous Loves;
And insamously dear: A Brother's Bribe;
E'en God's Anointed, and of Judah's Tribe;
Where barefoot they approach the sacred Shrines,
And think it only Sin to feed on Swine.*

DRYDEN.

The Scholiast of Juvenal understands, here, by Berenice, a Sister of Ptolemy, King of Egypt, and, by Agrippa, a Son of Julia, Daughter of Augustus; That Son of Julia, and of Agrippa, whom Tiberius put to Death, after the Decease of Augustus (26). To say no worse, it is prodigious Carelessness in This Scholiast; for it appears plainly, upon a little attention, that Juvenal speaks of an Agrippa, who lived in Judæa, which can no ways agree with the Son of Julia. Besides that, according to Noldius's Observation (27), no one ever said, that Agrippa, and his unchaste Sister Julia, were ever accused of Incest. It is not easy to reprove the Scholiast on the other Point, because the repeating of the Word dedit made some learned Men believe, that the Poet supposes here two Persons, who gave each a Diamond of great Value to his Sister; I. A King of Egypt. II. An Agrippa. This Explication is not good. The whole must relate to Agrippa, King of the Jews, and to his Sister Berenice: And we learn a Particular here, which Josephus did not touch upon; namely, that Berenice received a Diamond of great Value from her Brother, and that she wore it, which caused their incestuous Love to make the greater Noise. Baronius thought, that Juvenal alluded to a precious Stone, mentioned by Pliny, which Ptolemy, King of Egypt, gave to his Wife, who was also his Mother, as Baronius pretends. Alludere videtur pretioso lapidi, quem prius dedit Ptolemæus Egypti Rex uxori suæ & matri. Verum Plinius tradit fuisse topazium (28). A modern Author, whom I have already quoted several times (29), finds many Faults in This Opinion of the Annalist. I. Juvenal speaks of a Diamond, enchased, or set in a Ring; but the precious Stone, mentioned by Pliny, was a rough Topaz, which was afterwards made into a Statue. II. It was not Ptolemy, who gave This Topaz to his Mother; but it was Polemon, Governor of the Island, where the Topaz was found, who gave it to Berenice, Mother of the King, that succeeded Him, who then reigned. III. Pliny does not say, that Ptolemy Philadelphus made a Present of This Stone to his Wife Arsinoë, who was also his Sister; he says only, that they made a Statue of Arsinoë, the Wife of Ptolemy Philadelphus, of That Stone, and that This Statue was four Cubits high, and that it was consecrated in a Temple, which was called The Golden Temple. We may add a fourth Censure; which is, That we do not find, that any King of Egypt married his own Mother, and that This agrees less with the Father of Ptolemy Philadelphus, than with any other. It is of his Wife, that Pliny speaks, when he says, that the Topaz in question was brought to Queen Berenice. I am much less surprized at these Faults of Baronius, than to find Father Hardouin of Opinion, that Juvenal's Words are to be understood of the Diamond of the same Berenice, mentioned by Pliny, the Wife of Ptolemy Lagus, and Mother of Ptolemy Philadelphus (30). The Juvenal Variorum contains many Mistakes in relation to Berenice. There is in it a Note, which says, that the Berenice, mentioned by That Poet, was Queen of Judæa, and Herod's Wife: that, according to others, he meant Berenice, Herod's Wife, and, after her Husband's Death, Mistress to her Brother-in-law, that is, to Agrippa, her Husband's Brother. This is all wrong; for, in the first Place, here are two different Herodi, which they have not taken care to distinguish by any Mark whatever. One of them must be He, who slew the Children of Bethlehem; the other must be the King of Chalcis, Brother of Agrippa, the first of That Name. Now, the first of the two Herodi had no Wife, whose Name was Berenice; and there was no Berenice, Queen of Judæa. Neither was there any Berenice in Judæa, whose Incest consisted in the Love of her Brother-in-law. The Incest, mentioned by Josephus, and Juvenal, consists in the Amours of Agrippa, the second of That Name, with his own Sister Berenice. That, which deceived the Author of the Annotation, is, that Berenice was the Widow of Herod, King of Chalcis, and Brother of an Agrippa, when her Love for Agrippa was spoken of: But the Agrippa, of whose Brother she was Widow, was not He, with whom she committed Incest. She was Daughter of That other Agrippa, and Sister to This. There is another Remark in the Juvenal Variorum, the Author of which calls himself Lubin. This Lubin makes use of a pleasant manner of arguing. After having said, that Herod Agrippa was Berenice's Brother, he proves, that the Love of That Agrippa for Berenice was Incest, because she had been married to her Uncle Herod. Herod, Agrippa dedit incestæ suæ forori Berenice, cum qua incestum commiserat, ut pote quæ ante nupta erat patruo suo Herodi. Noldius, who observed two Faults in This Variorum, and who placed them to the Account of Schrevelius, the Compiler of That Commentary (31), took no notice of This.

(26) He had been confined by Augustus, to the Island Planasia, Tacit. Ann. lib. i. cap. 3. and not in Sicily, as the Scholiast says.

[H] I shall remark some Errors of Moreri.] The first Berenice, of whom he speaks, is the Mother of Ptolemy Philadelphus, King of Egypt. What he says of her is not to be found in the Author, whom he quotes (32). The second is the Daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and Wife of Ptolemy Evergetes: He quotes Ælian, and Justin, who do not say what he relates. He should have quoted Hyginus (33) who mentions what relates to this Queen's Head of Hair. As for the Temple of Berenice the Guardian, I confess, I cannot discover the Source of it, and, therefore, I dare not affirm, that Moreri has advanced a Falshood. I have many suspicions about it. He should have remembered, that he had said, in the Article of ARSINOË the Daughter of Antiochus Soter, that Berenice, the Wife of Ptolemy Evergetes, was the Daughter of Magus King of Cyrene (34), and Brother of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and, consequently, Uncle of Ptolemy Evergetes. At that time, Berenice, the Wife of Ptolemy Evergetes, was but his first Cousin; at present, she is his own Sister. Every one sees how much such Variations confound the Readers, and are sufficient to make them weary of the Study of a Dictionary. Such a Chaos should be cleared, by observing, who They are, that relate things one way, and who Those, that relate them another way. The third Berenice, according to Moreri, is Sister to the second, and Wife of Antiochus Soter, King of Syria. He should have said Antiochus Theus, and not Antiochus Soter; the former was the Son of the latter, and was married to a Daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus, whose Name was Berenice (35). The fourth is the Daughter of Ptolemy Auletes. I have made an Article about her; see the Remarks of it. The fifth is Berenice the Sister of Agrippa II of That Name. What Moreri says, that This Princess was with her Brother Agrippa in the Year 55, when St Paul pleaded his Cause in their Presence, and in That of the Proconfuls, Felix and Pontius (36) Festus, supposes

[I] ----- Of Hofman, Charles Stephens, &c.] I. Hofman's first Mistake consists in affirming, that the Berenice, mentioned by Juvenal, was the Daughter of Herod the Ascalonite (38), and Wife of her Brother Agrippa. This is, at least, a double, or tripple, Mistake; for That Herod had no Daughter, whose Name was Berenice, nor a Son, whose Name was Agrippa: She, whom Juvenal speaks of, was Daughter of the first Agrippa, and was never married to her Brother Agrippa, the second of That Name; it was only believed, that she had an incestuous Commerce with him. St Chrysostom was mistaken, or spoke figuratively, when he called her the Wife of Agrippa (39). II. It is a second Mistake to say, that the Berenice, whom Titus loved, is different from Her, whom Juvenal mentions. Hofman makes them different, since he treats of Her, who was Titus's Mistress, in an Article apart. III. It is not true, that the Berenice of Juvenal made a Journey to Jerusalem with her Head shaved and bare-footed. Hofman should have said, that, in order to accomplish a Vow, she went to Jerusalem, where she observed the Ceremonies required in such Cases; which were, that, before any Sacrifices were offered, they put up Prayers for thirty Days, had their Heads shaved, and abstained from Wine. This is all that Josephus tells us concerning This Journey of Berenice (40). It is true, he observes, that she went bare-footed to the Governor's Audience; but this cannot be said to be a Journey to Jerusalem. IV. What signifies it to quote the Twenty fifth Chapter of the Acts, and the sixteenth Book of Strabo, immediately after having said, that Berenice went to Jerusalem, with her Head shaved, and bare-footed? Is This mentioned in the Book of the Acts? And does not Strabo speak of a Berenice, who was the Grand-mother of This: LLOYD has committed the first and third Fault of Hofman; and it is from

Him, that the latter trascribed them. CHARLES STEPHENS falsifies Pliny's Testimony; He makes him say, That Plutolmy Philadelphus built a fine Town on the Red-Sea, and called it Berenice, after his Mother's Name. Pliny says only, that That Town bore the Name of Plutolmy Philadelphus's Mother. Berenice, Oppidum matris Philadelphi nomine (41). This puts me in mind of a Fault of Hofman, which I had omitted: He makes Pliny say, that That Berenice gave her Name to a City, which she caused to be built. Thus much concerning the first Fault of Charles Stephens. The second is his having said, that there was a Berenice, the Daughter of Herod the Ascalonite, who married her Brother Agrippa. We have already found This Fault in Lloyd, and Hofman's Lloyd took it from Charles Stephens. Some one will tell me perhaps; "you misunderstand these Words; Berenice, Herodis Ascalonitæ filia, quæ nupsit etiam Agrippæ fratri (42). You explain them, as "if the Meaning of them were, that Berenice married her own Brother; but they must be understood in this Sense; that she was married to Agrippa's Brother, which is the Sense of Lloyd and Hofman's Words. Berenice Herodis Ascalonitæ filia, Agrippæ fratris uxor." I answer, That I explain the Latin Words of these three Authors in the most natural Sense; and that, since the two latter confirm the Words alledged; by the Authority of Juvenal, they meant, without doubt, that Agrippa was the Husband, and not the Husband's Brother. I can, at least, convict them of a Fallacy: They suppose, that Berenice, the Wife of Agrippa's Brother, was the Daughter of Herod the Ascalonite: This is false; she was the Daughter of Agrippa, the first of That Name, who married her to his Brother Herod, King of Chalcis. The third Fault is, his quoting Strabo for the pretended Daughter of Herod the Ascalonite; whereby it appears, that Charles Stephens knew not, that Strabo speaks only of the Daughter of Salome. That Daughter makes a separate Article in his Dictionary: which shews, that he did not take the one for the other, but that he fancied to himself two distinct Persons; which might pass for a fourth Mistake.

BERGAMO (JAMES PHILIP de), an Augustin Monk, was born at Bergamo, in the Year 1434. He composed, in Latin, a Chronicle from the Creation of the World, down to the Year 1503 [A]; and a Treatise of Illustrious Women. He was of a very considerable Family [B], and became a Monk in the Year 1451 [C]. He had a particular Devotion for Nicolas Tollenin, by whose Intercession he believed himself to have been cured of the Plague, in 1474 (a). He died at Bergamo, in the Year 1518, in the Monastery of his Order, of which he had been Prior, and had repaired it at a very great Expence (b). Consult Moreri's Dictionary, under the Word FORESTA. What you meet with faulty, there, may be corrected by comparing it with This Article.

[A] He composed, in Latin, A Chronicle from the Creation of the World down to the Year 1503. Vossius observes, that the first Edition is of Brescia, and that it ends at the Year 1485, and not 1436, as Possévin affirms (1). Bellarmin has committed the same Mistake (2). The second Edition is of Venice, and comes down to the Year 1503. Vossius says, that the Author remarks, at the end of the Book, that he was then Sixty nine Years of Age. This Work was re-printed at Paris, in the Year 1535, with a Continuation down to That Time. It was translated into Italian, and published, at Venice, in the Year 1540, in Folio. This Edition contains Additions to the Work of the first Compiler, down to the Year 1539. The Author of these Additions was One Bernardino Bindoni, of Milan. I am of Opinion, that Philip of Bergamo continued the Work after the Year 1503, and that Part of what follows was His; but This Italian Version does not distinguish the Additions, which came from another Hand. I have not found, at the end of the Year 1503, that the Author gives us the Account of his Age, as related by Vossius.

[B] He was of a very considerable Family. It was That of the Foresti. Matthew de Bergamo, who was of this noble Family, and a very learned Civilian, obtained, of the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria, very great Privileges, both for himself, and his Posterity. He was created a Count Palatin, with the Right of instituting Notaries, Doctors, Knights, and Judges, in every part of Italy, and of legitimating Bastards, &c. A List of all these Privileges is to be met with in Our Author's Chronicle (4). They have been confirmed by all the Lords, who have been in Possession of Bergamo. The Letters Patents of this Grant of Lewis of Bavaria were dated at Trent, the twentieth of January, 1330 (5).

[C] He became a Monk, in the Year 1451. He affirms, somewhere in his Chronicle, according to Vossius, that John Roebus admitted him into his Convent, with some other young Persons, in the Year 1451; but I find, in the Italian Version of This Chronicle, that it was John of Novara, Superior of the Augustins of Bergamo, who associated him to his Order, the first of May, 1451. He had been speaking of John Roebus, Reformer of the Augustins, and their General, who died at Mantua, in the Year 1461, aged seventy Years. Immediately after, he speaks of John of Novara, who had strongly seconded John Roebus in the Work of Reforming the Order, and who succeeded him in the Dignity of Prior of the Convent of Crema, in consequence of which he was promoted to the same Office in the Convent of Bergamo. They, who have the Latin Edition, which Vossius made use of, may examine whether he is mistaken. The Italian, which I consult, was made from the Edition of Paris, corrected from many Errors.

BERGIER (NICOLAS), was born at Reims, in the Year 1557. He studied there in the new University, which the Cardinal of Lorraine had lately established, and was also a Teacher in it for some Years. From the College he went to the Count de Saint Souplet, Great Bailiff of the Province, to be Tutor to his Children, and, afterwards, embraced the Profession of an Advocate, in which he had very good Success. The Inhabitants of the City of Reims, who knew his Merit and Capacity, made him their Syndic, and deputed him often to Paris, upon the Affairs of the City. This brought him acquainted with several learned Men, and, amongst others, with Mess. Peiresc, and Du Puy, to whom he communicated the Design of his Book of the Higb-Ways of the Roman Empire, and who encouraged him greatly to put it in Execution. For this End, Mr Peiresc communicated to him the Map of Peuting (a). But of all the Friends, and Patrons, which his good Qualities procured him, the chief, and most famous, was Nicolas de Bellievre, President a Mortier, in the Parliament of Paris; who procured him a Brief of the Crown, constituting him Historiographer, with a Pension of Two hundred Crowns, and entertained him at his House, where he spent the Remainder of his Life. He died the fifteenth of September, 1623, in the Castle of Grignon, belonging to Monf. de Bellievre. The Epitaph, which That illustrious President made to the Memory of his Friend, is to be found at the beginning of The History of Reims, printed in 1629 (b). I shall speak, below, of Bergier's Works [A]. See also, at the end of this Dictionary, the Dissertation on the Day, Remark [B].

[A] I shall speak of Bergier's Works. Besides the History of the Higb-ways of the Roman Empire, he composed also le bouquet Royal, which is a Relation of the Coronation of Lewis XIII., printed at Reims, in the Year 1637; A Treatise of Day-break, printed at Reims, in the Year 1629, and which had been printed at Paris, in the Year 1617, under the Title of Archemeron (1); Le dessein de l'Histoire de Reims, printed in 1637. He wrote the Life of St

Albert, with the History of the Translation of his Body from Reims to Brussels, in the Year 1612, at the Request of the Archduke Albert. He received a Chain of Gold as a Reward, sent him by that Prince; but the Work was not printed; and the Manuscript is in the Hands of the Author's Heirs, with some other Papers, written with his own Hand, concerning the Excellency of Learning; and the Antiquity and Excellency of Poetry, and Speculative Music (2).

BERIGARDUS (CLAUDIUS), one of the most subtle Philosophers of the XVIIth Century, was of Moulins. He acquired such a Reputation in the University of Paris, that the Great Duke of Florence drew him to That of Pisa (a). He taught Philosophy, there, twelve Years (b); after which, he was invited to Padua, for the same Profession. He was discharging it honourably, when, in 1643, he published a Book at Udina, which greatly displeased several Divines [A], though it was approved by the Holy Office. He had published another at Florence, in the Year 1632 (c). His Cut, prefixed to the Book, printed in the Year 1643, makes him Fifty one Years of Age; but the Year of the Century is not marked.

(c) Entitled, Dubitaciones, Gulae Galilei. Lyncei.

[A] He published a Book — which greatly displeased several Divines. The Title of it is Circulus Pisanus. See, here, the Judgment, which an Archdeacon of Canterbury passed on it. "Hunc (Cæsalpinum) eadem impietatis viâ & ratione non modò fecutus est, sed superavit, Claudius Berigardus Moliensis, qui unâ cum impiâ Aristotelis disciplinâ obsoletam istam quoque veterum Iconicorum (quem admodum de iis ipse tenuit ac alii plerique censuerunt) revocavit; cum enim disputationes suas dialogorum consuetudine perscripsit, sermonem in duas personas Charilaum & Aristæum distribuit, quorum alter Aristotelem, qui præter materiam, quandam primum motorem, providentiæ tamen expertem, posuit, alter antiquos istos defendit, quos omnia corporea esse velle, nullumque primum motorem ab universo corporeo distinxisse putavit. Atque adeo uno eodémque opere diversas cum Epicuræ tum Peripateticæ impietatis rationes adornavit, quamquam Aristotelis disciplinam fusiis & ardentius excoluit, atque eam potissimum quam libro 'Physicorum octavo, librisque de Cælo & rerum Generatione, tradidit, quibus universam mundi fabricam sine Providentiæ architectrice extruxisse se putat Philosophus. Neque nefaria sua dogmata dispersè uno aut altero capite (ut Cæsalpinus) insinnavit, sed apertè omnem Peripateticæ impietatis rationem secutus est, neque numinis providentiam ut ille de rerum naturâ tollere satis habuit, nisi & falsè dictis (qualia vir non admodum facetus potuit) increparet (1). — Hunc autem sicut & Cæsalpinum, quamquam multò uterius rem tractavit, & quidem integrum peripateticæ impietatis systema descripsit, hoc loco redarguere operæ pretium non existimo, quòd in uno Aristotele vincantur qui ab eo steterunt omnes (2). — He (Cæsalpinus) was not only followed but surpassed, in this Way and Method of 'Impiety, by Claudius Berigardus of Moulins; who, together with the blasphemous Doctrine of Aristotle, revived That of the ancient Ionians, obsolete both in his own, and the Opinion of Others: for, writing his Disputations in the Way of Dialogue, he divides the Discourse between two Persons, Charilaus and Aristippus; of whom the One defends Aristotle, who, besides Matter, supposed a certain First Mover, but denied a Providence, the Other vindicates those ancient Philosophers, who, he supposed, would have every thing to be corporeal, and to have made no distinction between the first Mover, and the corporeal Universe. And thus, in one and the same Work, has he displayed the different Arguments both of the Aristotelean and Peripatetic Impiety, though he more largely and zealously cultivated the Doctrines of Aristotle, That in particular, which he has delivered in the Eighth Book of his Physics, and his Book, de Cælo & Rerum Generatione, in which the Philosopher pretends to have raised the Fabric of the Universe without an Architectural Providence. Nor has he insinuated his wicked Tenets in One or Two Chapters (as Cæsalpinus has done) but has openly espoused the whole Peripatetic Impiety; nor was he satisfied, like him, with destroying a Providence, but (which requires no very great Degree of Wit) must ridicule and laugh at the Nation. — But it is not worth my while, at present, to confute this Author, any more than Cæsalpinus, though he has handled the Subject much more copiously, and indeed delineated a complete System of Peripatetic Impiety, because, in Aristotle alone, All his Followers stand condemned." Mr de Villenandy, a French Minister (3), passes the same Judgment; for he looks upon Berigardus as a great Favourer of Pyrrhonism, and a Propagator of Impiety: "Vestigiis ejus (Pomponatii) institit Berigardus in Circuli Pisanis sub sæculi hujus initium. Quanta ab his, nonnullisque aliis ejusdem ordinis doctoribus, malorum seges in scientiis,

"scientiis, societate civili, & religione luxuriant, non runt erudit." — Berigardus in his Circuli Pisani ni trad in his (Pomponatus) Steps, about the beginning of this Century. The Learned know what a plentiful Crop of Evils has sprung up, by means of these and the like Teachers, in The Sciences, in Civil Society, and in Religion." He explains himself more fully in another place. "Ipsorum quidem dubitationes, contentendique pruritus, eo usque non evagantur, ut vel Divinam Providentiam, vel etiam Existentiam, aperte summoveant; ita tamen procedunt eorum nonnulli, ut summovere velle videantur: utcumque sit, suspecta est admodum eorum religio ac fides. Cum, ex g. Claudius Berigardus, in Circulis suis Pisani, res omnes Physicas, imo & Divinas perasque, ex principis Aristotelis ita declarat & astruit, ut eadem illas ex oppositis Anaximandri hypothesibus, purum atheismum redolentibus, continuo impugnet ac subvertat; an quicquam in rebus Physicis stabile & immotum relinquit? Nonne contra perpetua sua ille liberatione cunctas suspendit? Deinde quod tendit assumpta hanc Anaximandri hypothesi, quam Berigardus Aristotelicæ longe præfert, nisi eo ut in Supremi Numinis ejusque Providentiæ locum infinitam quandam materiam, infinitis corporibus diffimilariis, ex seipsis mobilibus, constam, hoc est, in Veri Dei locum Cæcæ Naturæ substituat (5)? — Their Septicism, and Itch of Disputation, do not run such lengths, as openly to set aside the Providence, or Existence, of God; yet some of them proceed so far, that they seem inclined to deny both: be it as it will, there is great reason to suspect their Religion and their Faith. For instance, when Claudius Berigardus, in his Circuli Pisani, so lays down and establishes all Physical Effects, and even many Divine, upon Aristotle's Principles, as immediately to attack, and overthrow, them by the Opposite Hypotheses of Anaximander, which favour of downright Atheism, can be said to have left any thing certain, and that may be depended upon, in Natural Philosophy? On the contrary, does he not bring every thing into doubt by his continual Wavering? Lastly, whether tends this Hypothesis of Anaximander, which Berigardus has assumed, and prefers to That of Aristotle, but to justify an infinite Matter, composed of infinite dissimilar, self-moving, Corpuscles, in the Room of a Supream Deity, and his Providences; that is, Blind Nature in the Room of the True God? He quotes him, page 100, as having said a Thing, which is full of Libertinism; but it is worth remarking, that the Words, which he ascribes to him, and which are printed in Italica, are not to be found in his Work. These are his Words. "Ex iis ducl quidem notionem Virtutis ejusdam, quæ omnia disolverit, ac sapientissime regat, sed hanc nihil aliud esse, quam Universi totius corporis vigorem, ab ipso sola ratione distinctum: cuius Universi singulæ partes, divinitatis participes, se ipsis misceantur ad omnia componenda, nullo alio Intellectu ordinante, quam sua ipsarum energia, perinde ad finem optimum tendente ac si ab aliqua mente dirigerentur (6). — Hence we deduce the Notion of a certain Virtue, which dispels, and most wisely governs, all things; but that This Virtue is nothing else but the Energy of the whole corporeal Universe, and is distinct from it only in the Order of our Ideas; that All things are formed by the Intermixture of the several Parts of This Universe, each partaking of Divinity, and ranged in order by no other Intellect, than their own Energy, tending as surely to the best end, as if directed by any Mind whatever." Mr de Villemandy should, therefore, have told his Readers, that he did not quote the Text of Berigardus, but the Paraphrase of his Thought. I have quoted That Author, in the Article RUFINUS, Remark [C].

BERYTUS, a maritime Town of Pœnicia, near Mount Libanus, was also called Beroë [A]. It was said, that Saturn built it (a). It had a good Harbour, the Description whereof is to be found in the Itinerary of John Ptoleas (b). Strabo says, that it was ruined by Trypho, and rebuilt by the Romans (c). It was Augustus, who rebuilt it (d), and made a Colony of it, which was called Julia Felix (e), and enjoyed the Jus Italicum (f). Agrippa led two Legions thither (g). It was one of the three Cities, in which the Civil-Law was publicly taught [B]; The other two were Rome, and Constantinople. There is some reason to believe, that there were more Professors in Berytus, than in either of the other two [C]. The Conflagrations, Inundations, and Earthquakes, which ruined it several Times, did not hinder the Law-Schools from [A] It was also called Beroë. Neither the Testimony of Eusebius, alleged by Father Hardouin (1), nor That of Stephanus Byzantinus, alleged by William Grotius (2), serve me for a Proof; for I have not found, that Eusebius, or Stephanus Byzantinus, say so. My Proofs are Thole, which Scaliger found in the Epigrams of John Barbutaltes, on the burning of Berytus, and in the Forty first Book of the Dionysia of Nonnus (3), and Thole, which Mr Menage discovered in the third Book of the same Dionysia (4), and in an Epigram of the Antologia (5), where Bertrand (6) would, without Reason, have changed the Word Beroë into That of Βερύτιος (7).

[B] It was one of the three Cities, in which the Civil-Law was publicly taught. In all the Roman Empire, there were but these three Cities, which were permitted to have Schools of Law. This is surprising, when we consider the Extent of That Empire; and more surprising still, when we think of the many Universities, which are at present in Europe. What a Change of Customs? The seven United Provinces, which are but a Point in the Map, in comparison of the Roman Monarchy, have twice or thrice as many Schools of Civil-Law, as there were in That vast State. Let us prove what ought to be proved: "Hæc autem tria volumina (they are Justinian's Words) (8) à nobis composita tradi eis tam in regibus urbibus (9), quam in Berytensium pulcherrima civitate (quam & legum nutrimentum bene quis appellet) tantummodo volumus: quod jam & à retro principibus constitutum est, & non in aliis locis, quæ à Majoribus tale non meruerunt privilegium. — We will, that these Three Volumes, composed by us, be delivered only to Those of the Royal Cities (Rome and Constantinople) and the flourishing City of Berytus, which may deservedly be called The Nursery of The Law: it having been so constituted and appointed by Our Predecessors, and no other Places having deserved to enjoy such a Privilege." These Words inform us, that the Predecessors of Justinian fixed the number of the Schools of Civil-Law to Three; but it is not known, at what time This was done. The first, who, in Mr Menage's Opinion (10), has mentioned the School of Berytus, is Gregory Thaumaturgus (11), who lived under Alexander Severus. The Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius makes mention of a young Martyr, who suffered death under the Reign of Maximian, and who had studied at Berytus (12). That School was, then, very flourishing (13). It was no less so, when Zachary of Mytilene wrote against Ammonius: He calls Berytus πύργος τῶν νόμων, parentem legum. He flourished in the VIth Century. His Treatise is in the eleventh Volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum, in the Edition of Paris, 1644.

[C] There were more Professors in Berytus, than in either of the other two. The Title de studii liberalibus urbis Romæ & Constantinopolitane, in the Theodosian Code, and in That of Justinian, informs us, that there were but two Professors of Law at Rome, and two at Constantinople. Now, as Justinian addresses the Constitution, de juris decendi ratione, to eight Professors of Law, we must conclude, that there were four of them in the School of Berytus. See Mr Menage (14).

from being set up there again [D]. The Metropolitan Dignity, which Theodosius the Younger granted to the Bishops of Berytus, was only titular [E].

[D] The Conflagrations, &c. did not hinder the Law Schools from being set up there again. For proof of this, I will give you the following Words of Francis Banduin. "Berytum Syriæ urbem fuisse nutricem legum Ro. ait nolter. Just. ut & Jurisprudentiæ Eunapius vocat, & ante utrumque Nonnus multo magis. Quid igitur? Tempore Constantii terræ motu convulsam fuisse ait Cedrenus. Sed fuisse restitutam & tempore Justiniani nostri floruisse constat. Cum vero Justinianus jam illi suos juris civilis libros explicandos tradidisset, ecce horribiliori terræ motu cum auditoribus & doctores absorpta est. Testis est Agathias. Sed idem testis est eo casu minime deterritum Justinianum fuisse quominus illam instauraret. Ergo rursus instaurata esse quo magis semper extaret sedes jurisprudentiæ. Mirum vero, ecce paulo post inundatione & incendio iterum vastatam esse lego. Nam id testatur vetus liber Græcorum Epigrammatum. Necdum tamen cesserunt talibus tempestatibus qui afflicte jurisprudentiæ opem ferre debuerunt (15). — Berytus, a City of Syria, was called, by Justinian, the Nursery of the Roman Law; by Eunapius, the Mother of the Civil-Law; and by Nonnus, before them both, much more. What then? Cedrenus tells us, it was thrown down by an Earthquake in the Time of Constantius. But we know, that it was rebuilt, and that it was in a flourishing Condition in the Reign of our Justinian. But no sooner had Justinian delivered to it his Books of Civil-Law, to be explained, but it was swallowed up, together with it's Auditors and Doctors, by a more dreadful Earthquake. Agathias testifies this. But the same Author informs us, that Justinian was not in the least deterred by this Accident from rebuilding it. It was therefore restored, that it might for ever be The Seat of Law. Yet, strange to relate! I read, that it was, very soon after, destroyed by an Inundation, and Conflagration. This is testified by an old Book of Greek Epigrams. Yet these great Calamities did not prevent These, whose Duty it was, from succouring the Distressed Law.

[E] The Metropolitan Dignity — of it's Bishop was only titular. Theodosius the Younger, being imposed upon by Eustathius, Bishop of Berytus, made this Decree (16). "Propter multas justitiae causas Metropolitanum nomine & dignitate civitatem Berytum decernimus exornandam, jam suis virtutibus coronatam. Igitur hæc quoque Metropolitanam habeat dignitatem, Tyro nihil de suo jure derogetur. Sit illa mater Provinciæ majorum nostrorum beneficio; hæc nostræ. — Many and just Reasons moving us thereto, we decree, that the City of Berytus, already crowned with it's Virtues, be adorned with the Metropolitan Title and Dignity, saving to Tyre it's full Rights and Privileges. Be she the Mother of the Province, by the Favour of our Predecessors; This by Our Own." The Emperor declares, that he will not lessen the Rights of the Metropolis of Tyre in any manner whatever: He did not pretend, then, that the Bishop of Berytus struck at any of Those Rights. Nevertheless, Eustathius, spurred by Ambition, usurped Authority over many Churches, which depended on the Metropolis of Tyre. Complaints were made of it to the Council of Chalcedon, who restrained him within his Bounds; and the Privilege, which Theodosius had granted him, was like That, which Marcian afterwards granted to the City of Chalcedon. "Chalcedonensem civitatem, in qua sanctæ fidei concilium gestum est, Metropolis privilegia habere sancimus, nomine tantum, salva videlicet Nicomedienfium civitati propria dignitate. — We decree, that Chalcedon, where was held a Council of the Holy Faith, shall enjoy the Privileges of a Metropolis, in Name only, that is saving the just Dignity of the City of Nicomedia." ST BERNARD, Abbot of Clairvaux, flourished in the XIIth Century. He acquired so great an Esteem, that the whole Weight of the Church seemed to lie on his Shoulders, and that Kings and Princes made choice of him for the general Arbitrator of their Differences [A]. It is certain, that he had very great Talents, and a great deal of Zeal; but some pretend, that his Zeal made him too jealous of Those, who acquired a great Name by the Study of Human Learning; and they add, that his mild and easy Temper rendered him too credulous, when he heard any ill Report of Those learned Persons. They believe, that, by reason of these Principles, he suffered himself to be too much prejudiced against Abelard [B]. It is difficult to imagine, that he was free from human Passions, when he made it his whole Business to procure Anathemas against all Those, who appeared to him to be Heterodox: But it is very easy to conceive, that his great Reputation, and the Ardour, with which he solicited the Condemnation of his Adversaries, imposed upon the Judges, and made the accused Persons sink under the Weight of Those irregular Proceedings. However it be, he verified the Interpretation

[A] He acquired so great an Esteem, that Princes made choice of him for the general Arbitrator of their Differences. It will not be improper, upon this Occasion, to hear Francis d'Amboise: thus he expresses himself. "Plus favoris in humilitate adeptus, quam Salomon in omni gloria sua, ita omnes in sui admirationem — ad famam sui nominis, ad sui amorem & observantiam, rapuit, ut ad eum totius Orbis Vota concurrerent, ut ab ejus monitis & exemplis tota res monastica & ecclesiastica pendere visa sit, ut ab ejus oraculis Præfules, Principes, Populi, consilium expeterent, eumque induciarum ac pacis arbitrum agnoscerent, & se ejus orationibus omnes Ordines cupiverint esse commendatos (1). — Having gained more Favour in his Humility, than Solomon in all his Glory, he was so generally admired and beloved, that he had the good Wishes of the whole World, that Monastic and Ecclesiastical Affairs seemed wholly to depend on his Precepts and Example; that he was consulted as an Oracle by high and low, and acknowledged as the Arbitrator both of Truces and of Peace, and that all Orders of Men desired to be recommended to his Prayers.

[B] His Zeal made him jealous — and his easy Temper made him credulous — with regard to learned Men, and particularly Abelard. I have quoted a long Passage of Francis d'Amboise, in the preceding Remark: here is another still longer. "Pace igitur Sancti Abbatis licet dicere quod de eo ausus est Annalibus mandare ejus discipulus, Claræ vallis quondam Monachus, demum Abbas Morimontanus, Otho, Episcopus, Frisingensis, Leopoldi Pii Marchionis Austriæ filius, Frederici I. Aenobarbi, cujus vitam scripsit, patruus, qui quavis Abbate suum in magna habuerit veneratione, tamen scribit eum ex Religionis Christianæ fervore zelotypum, & ex habituali (sic enim loquitur) mansuetudine quodammodo credulum, ut Magistrum qui humanis rationibus & seculari sapientie confiderent nimium inhærebant abhorreret, & de talibus finistrum quid recitanti facile aurem præberet, juxta illud Festi, τὰ πολλὰ γράμμα'τα εἰς μάραν πρὸς ἐξήντη. C. fieri potuit ut sibi in animum induxerit quædam esse dicta aut scripta ab Abelardo quæ non essent, aut quæ in peiorum partem accipi non deberent (2). — Let me, therefore, by the Holy Abbot's Leave, repeat what came off with saying, that the Sins of Those, who had taken up the Cross, had prevented the Effect of his Prophecies [F]. There is no Impostor, but may shelter himself behind such an Intrenchment. St Bernard was canonized: He is one of the greatest Saints in the Romish Communion; and it is pretended, that he wrought a world of Miracles, both in his Life-time, and after his Death. Observe, that he once went up to his Neck into the Water, to free himself from the Temptation, into which the Sight of a Woman had led him (b). The best Edition that we have of his Works, is That of 1690. It is the second, which the learned Father Mabillon took care to procure. The Journalists of Leipsic have spoken very exactly of it (c): It is accompanied with several learned Prefaces. It is acknowledged, in one of them, that St Bernard taught, that the Souls of the Blessed are received into Heaven, and into the Society of the Angels, as soon as they are separated from their Bodies, but that they enjoy only the Sight of the Humanity of JESUS CHRIST, and not the Sight of God.

Pope, were the fittest in the World to prejudice, and exasperate, them against Abelard; they mentioned nothing but Sacrileges, Lyons, and Dragons. "Legite, si placet, librum, quem dicit, Theologiae, legite & alium, quem dicunt, sententiarum, nec non & illum qui inscribitur, Scito te ipsum, & animadvertite quantae ibi silvecant fegetes sacri- legiorum & errorum. --- Leonem evasimus, sed incidimus in Draconem (12). --- Read, I beseech you, his Book (as he calls it) of Divinity; Read another (as it is called) of his Sentences, and That entitled, Know thy self; and observe how plentifully Sacrilege and Error springs up in them. --- We have escaped a Lion, but are fallen in to the Claws of a Dragon." He was not contented to write in his own Name, but dictated some Letters for the Archbishop of Reims, and three of his Suffragans, in which they demanded the Thunders of the Court of Rome; and, when they had obtained the Condemnation of the Propositions, they had sent to the Pope, they published it abroad as a complete Victory; though, at the bottom, the Pope had pronounced nothing against Abelard's Perlon. Their Flourishes, and the great Stir they made, prevented every where the Cause of the Accused from being heard. They prepossessed the Minds of every one. These are the common Artifices of Caballers; I do not say, that others never make use of them. "At accusatores potentissimi, tanquam albis equis trium-phantes, laetum praena cantarunt, victoriamque suam toto orbe disseminarunt; ita ut miser ille inauditus apud probos quamplurimos male audiret, & ejus exemplaria, quae Galliam Italiamque splendore collustrant, tanquam horrendi criminis carmina vel voracibus rogis cremanda traderentur, vel in situ, squalore, & cinere veterum bibliothecarum laticantia putrescerent (13). --- But his most powerful Accusers, triumphing as it were on white Horses, sang a joyful Paean, and spread their Victory over all the World; inasmuch, that the poor Wretch was condemned, unheard, by many good Men, and his Works, which were the Ornament of France and Italy, like blasphemous, or obscene, Poems, were either thrown into the Fire, or rotted in old dusty Libraries."

[F] When he was reproached with the ill Success of his Crusade, he came off with saying, that the Sins of the Croisades have prevented the Effects of his Prophecies. This is, in truth, the whole Center of his Manifesto (14); for, if he alleges the Example of Moses, to shelter himself under the inviolable Authority of so great a Name, it is because he pretended, that the Members of the Crusade were no less polluted with Crimes, than the Children of Israel, and that therefore both had diverted the Effects of the Promises. See what a modern Philosopher (15) thought upon This.

BEROALDUS (MATTHEW) [A], born at Paris, taught the Hebrew Tongue at Orleans, in 1565. Those of Rochel offered him an Employ in their College, in the Year 1571 (a). I believe he did not accept of it. He was in Sancerre, when the Marshall de la Châtre besieged it, a little after the Massacre of Paris (b); and He did the Inhabitants great Services by his wife and courageous Counsels [B]. At his leaving Sancerre, he retired to Sedan, where he read Historical Lectures. Some were offended at the manner, in which it is pretended, that he spoke of Francis I. in his Lectures [C]. I cannot tell at what time he was Minister of Geneva [D]; but

[A] He was called MATTHEW. Theophilus Raynaud, by Mistake, calls him Michael (1). Thomasius, I find, doubts, whether This be a Mistake (2): He should not have doubted of it.

[B] And did the Inhabitants of Sancerre great Services by his wife and courageous Counsels. D'Aubignat observes this in two Places. "The Sancerrois, says he (3), composed also a Council, in which they found themselves particularly happy in Beroaldus, formerly Hebrew Reader at Orleans. He accompanied his Counsels with Courage. --- The Besieged, being very much astonished at this News, wanted to be supported by their Pastors; but chiefly stood in need of the wife and courageous Counsels of Beroaldus; according to which, they resolved to endure all the Miseries of a Siege, and that they, who would not consent to it, should be thrown over the Walls (4)."

[C] Some were offended at the manner, in which it is pretended, that he spoke of Francis I. in his Lectures. A Minister, who was then at Sedan, and who abjured his Religion afterwards, published what follows. "It is to be noted, that Matthew Beroaldus, a learned Man among them, and one of their Professors, being retired from Sancerre to Sedan, was defired, by the President la Louette, and some others, to read some Lectures; which he did in the same Place, where they preach, and delivered a System of Chronology, which he said he had made. Now, being come to the Reign of King Francis I., a Prince of Glorious Memory, and whom we may justly call the Father of Learning, and Restorer of Sciences, in This Kingdom of France; Advantages, which cannot be sufficiently valued, and which all Europe felt afterwards: Being, I say, come to the Reign of This Great and Virtuous Prince, he spoke so impudently, and irreverently, of him, and of his most illustrious, and most Christian, Posterity, that I know not one Man, breathing the Air of France, but would have been scandalized at it. The President, the Baylis, and other Magistrates, and all the Ministers, residing then at Sedan, were present; who, if they had had a Christian, and French, Heart, and not ungrateful for the Benefits arising from Learning, which That Good Prince revived, would certainly have been offended at it as well as myself, and would not have tolerated such a Person. At least, the President, and others, who had Authority in the City, should have given Notice of it to the Lord of the Place, who, being well affected to the Good of the Crown, and the King's Service, would, I am sure, have punished him according to his Deserts. But is was smothered. I spoke of it myself to the President, shewing him some other Faults, which the said Beroaldus had committed in Chronology; and I exhorted him, by the Obedience, which we all owe to our Prince; and for it cannot be questioned, that he was so; and, since he taught Philosophy there, in the Year 1576 (c), there is some reason to believe, that he exercised the Ministry, there, at that time. He published a Book of Chronology, in the Year 1575, in which there is, doubtless, much Learning, but little Solidity. In striving to do Honour to the Scripture, he loses himself in a Labyrinth, which he cannot get out of. He pretends, that no other Guide is to be followed, in the Doctrine of Times, but the Writings inspired by God [E]. Scaliger has plainly shewed the Insufficiency of this Hypothesis; but he has inveighed too much against The Author. Moreri goes too far, when he affirms, that, besides the Latin Chronology, there appeared many other Works of Beroaldus, and that he died about the Year 1575, or 76. La Croix du Maine, whom he quotes, does not say so; but only, that Beroaldus was no longer living in the Year 1584, and that it was probable, his other Compositions would be published by the Care of his Son, the Sieur de Verville.

(c) See Remark [D].

"for the Honour of our Nation, to perform his Duty in it; who answered me somewhat coldly, that he could have wished it had not been said, and that it was, in truth, a Piece of Imprudence. Yet he made his Report of my Remonstrance; which incensed them the more against me; tho' without any outward Appearance of it, except a few cross Looks: but they waited for an Opportunity (5)." I am willing this Discourse should be as much suspected of Falshood, as any one pleases; and, if it be false, so much the better for this Dictionary; which ought principally to contain the Errors of other Books. Let this be said with respect to a great many other Passages, which shall be quoted.

[D] I cannot tell, at what time he was Minister of Geneva. Beza does not determine it. He only gives Beroaldus the Quality of his Colleague in the Church, which imports, as Colomes (6) well observes, that Beroaldus exercised the Ministry at Geneva. He also taught Philosophy there, as the same Colomes observes (7), and as may be proved by the Epistle Dedicatory, which Lambert Daneaus prefixed to the Treatise of Heresies: It is said there, that, in 1576, Matthew Beroaldus taught Philosophy at Geneva. Here are Beza's own Words: Aliam igitur rursus rationem inii- vir beatæ memoriæ, & meus superioribus annis in hac Ecclesia collega, Beroaldus (8). I believe Beroaldus went to be Professor at Geneva, after he had been so at Sedan. Scaliger says, that he read with great Applause, and was admired at Sedan, and at Geneva, where there were some great Men (9).

[E] He would have no other Guide — than the Writings inspired by God. In consequence of this Maxim, he struck Cambyfes, and Darius, the Son of Hyaspes, out of the Catalogue of the Kings of Persia: for, says he, These Names appear no where in the Scripture; — quæ nomina, quia nunquam extant in Scriptura, à nobis sunt prætermissa (10). Vossius pretends, that he is mistaken as to the Fact; and that, if he was right in that Respect, he would, nevertheless, be much to blame in denying the Existence of Those Kings, under pretence that the Scripture makes no mention of them. Scaliger calls this manner of explaining the Times Fanatical and Prophetical (taking the last Word in an odious Sense) and maintains, that, if the prophane Authors had not supplied us with some Light, the Chronology of the Scripture could never have been disentangled. Aliam erat de Chronologia sacra, abique exoticis monumentis foret (11). He calls Pareus Hierophantam Beroaldinum.

BEROALDUS (FRANCIS), Sieur de Verville, Son of the foregoing, was born at Paris [A], the Twenty eighth of April, 1558 (a). He was a Man of Learning and Parts; but he did not make choice of proper Materials to perfect his natural Gifts. He took the pains to translate Polyphitus's Dream (b), and afterwards to compose a Piece of the same Stamp; it was entitled, The Travels of Fortunate Princes; which he called Steganographical. He wrote several Books of Chymistry, and several Tomes of Romances (c) [B], which are very tedious, and little better, than the Writings of Nerveze, and the Sieur des Escuteaux. Perhaps he would have done better to have continued exercising himself on the same Subjects, by which he appeared first in public. Being but Twenty two Years of Age, he published some Commentaries on the Mechanics of James Besson (d). He had scarce tried his Fortune this way, but he ran after the Philosopher's Stone. In the Year 1583, were published His Spiritual Apprehensions, Poems, and other Philosophical Works, with some Enquiries after the Philosopher's Stone (e). The Year after, he published a Poem, entitled, The Idea of a Republic (f).

[A] He was born at Paris. Mr de Marolles ought, then, to strike him out of the List, which he has given, of the Illustrious Tourangeaux (1).

[B] He wrote several kinds of tedious Romances. He was Author of The Adventures of Florida, Minerva's Closet, The Maid of Orleans, The History of Herodias, "and some other Works, wherein he introduces some Lords and Ladies, whose Conversations are not very ingenious; but, what is to be esteemed therein, is, the Sentiments of Honour and Virtue, which are the finest in the World, with many Secrets of Nature and Art, by means whereof many extraordinary things are performed; whereas the ancient Romans referred every thing to Magic, for want of Invention and Learning (2)."

[A] He was burnt, at Paris, the Twenty second of April 1529. We have a Proof of this Chronology in a Letter of Erasmus, dated the first of July 1529 (1). It contains an ample Relation of the Life and Death of Lewis de Berquin. It is expressly noted there, that he was burnt decimo Calend. Majas. This Proof would fix the Day of his Death, were it not for another Letter of Erasmus (2), in which the Execution of Berquin is placed on the seventeenth of April, XV Calend. Majas (3). This Letter is dated the ninth of May 1529. All, that Erasmus can do, is to fix us to the Month of April 1529; we must look on all the other Varieties as Mistakes. Mezerai is mistaken in the Year, and perhaps also in the Day: He affirms, that Berquin was burnt on the Twenty first of April, of the Year 1528 (4). John Crepin, in the Acts of the Martyrs, places the Death of This Person in the Month of May, in general, 1529. Beza places it on the Tenth of November, in the same Year (5), both in his Ecclesiastical History, and in another Work. Fragibus nocte post interitum illius proxima (qui fuit undecimus dies Novembris anno Domini was Lord of a Village, of which he bore the Name (a), and was very much esteemed in the Court of France, and honoured with the Title of the King's Counsellor (b). He lived a good Life, and regularly observed the Precepts of the Church. He was a Layman, and unmarried; yet he was never censured, in relation to his Chastity. Erasmus, who had learned these Particulars from some Persons, whom he could depend upon, adds, that they had also informed him, that Berquin abhorred Lutheranism (d), and that the great Crime, which was found in him, was, that he openly professed to hate morose and peevish Divines, and Monks, who were no less fierce, than ignorant (e). He spoke very ill of them publicly. This paved the way to a bloody War, that began with a Quarrel, which he had with one of the most violent Inquisitors of That Time (f) [B]. It was not long before they accused him as an Heretic: Certain Propositions were extracted from a Book, which he had published; whereupon he was Imprisoned; but the Judges, finding no Crime in him, acquitted him [C]. The Accusers pretended, that he had escaped Punishment by the Royal Authority; as for him, he said he was not beholden to any thing but the Justice of his Cause; and he behaved as formerly. He translated some of Erasmus's Books into French [D], and added something of his own to them. Immediately, Noel Beda, and his emissaries, began a new War; They extracted several Things out of Those Books, and, having informed against them, as pernicious Errors, they occasioned the Author's second Imprisonment. The Cause being judged, some Monks went to tell him the definitive Sentence, which was passed upon him: Which was, that his Books should be burnt; that he should retract his Errors, and submit to such Satisfaction, as should be prescribed to him; and that mini 1329.) in tota Gallia frigore perustis, & gravissima tum fame tum etiam peste conflagrata (6). Spontaneus plainly shews, that Beza is in an Error, by the fourth Letter of the Twenty fourth Book of Erasmus, which, being dated the first of July 1529, mentions Berquin's Execution; but he is afterwards mistaken, when he gives the Reason, why he thinks, that Beza falsified That Date (7). He says, It was done to make what was to be said on the Judgments of God more probable. Beza says, that Heaven declared for Berquin, and reversed the Sentence of the Judges, because, the following Night, the Frost spoiled all the Corn in the Kingdom; from whence a great Famine, and Mortality, ensued. Judicium Sententia veluti celsitus rescissa triumphavit, frugibus nostris, &c. (8). Nothing was more easy than to criticize Beza with Justice on this Point: For first, it is to dispose of the particular Providence of God a little too rashly, to say, that the Plagues, which desolate a whole Kingdom, are a Vengeance for the unjust Death of one Man. In the second place, Frost can do but little damage to Corn, the tenth, or eleventh, of November. They sow at that time, almost all the Kingdom over: and it is at least very certain, that the greatest Part of what is sowed is out of danger at that time. So that, if Beza had, with a premeditated Design, falsified the Date, he would have taken care not to pitch upon the Eve, or the Day, of St Martin. The right Time, noted by Erasmus, was much properer for his Reflexion; for Cold may hurt the Fruits of the Earth towards the end of April. Thus you see how Spontaneus might have confuted the moral Reflexion of Beza. If he had criticized him from my first Consideration, he would have disarmed himself; for he is as much accustomed, as any one, to say, that such or such Evils happen as Punishments for This or That. One of Those, who wrote against Maimbourg's History of Calvinism (9), observes, that Berquin was executed, the Twenty second of March, on the Eve of St Martin, the Pope, in the Place Maubert. What he adds of Dr Merlin, and which I shall relate below (10), persuades me, that he copied Beza; only he took notice, that the Month of November not being a Time, wherein Corn can receive any damage by the Cold, he sought another St Martin's Eve.

Let it not be wondered at, that the Day of such a Martyrdom was not well known to the Protestant Writers, and that they have variously reported the Date of it. The Battle of Cerisoles, the Death of Antony de Bourbon, King of Navarre, the Barricades of Paris, in the Time of Henry III, were not better dated by great Authors. See the Extract, which Mr Bernard gave, of a Book of Father du Lodel, in his News from the Republic of Letters, page 224, of the Month of February, 1699.

[B] He had a Quarrel with one of the most violent Inquisitors. Berquin was no Coward; he must have had a great Courage, since he feared neither an A Quercu, nor a Noel Beda. He durst, not only defend himself against them, but even attack them: Beza praises him for it. "Adfuit autem animi tanta generositas, ut maxime omnium tunc metuendis crabrones in ipsis eorum cavis, Bedam videlicet & a Quercu (de quibus scripserat, procul illos confignis, Erasmus, Lutetiae Betam sapere & Quercum concionari) Matælogorum ejus seculi principes, in ipso eorum sterquilinio sit ausus non modò utcumque laceflere, sed impietatis etiam accusatos non unius anni certamine tum voce tum scripsi strenuè exercere (11). — He was a Man of such Courage, that he ventured, not only to attack, upon their own Dung-hill, but vigorously to pursue, with an Action of Impiety, during a Contest of more than one Year, both in Speech and Writing, Those most formidable Hornets, Beda and a Quercu, of whom Erasmus, talking them at a Distance, wrote, that, at Paris, a Birch-Tree pretended to Learning, and an Oak to Oratory." See, here, what Erasmus says, concerning the Process, wherein Berquin was the Aggressor. "Non enim solum promittebat sibi abolitionem nem, verumetiam victoriam esse in manibus, sed malle seriùs aliquanto finire causam, quo magnificentius triumpharet. Jamque mutatis vicibus, ipsam facultatem sacratissimam, monachos & Beddicos reos peragebat impietatis. Nam quædam arcana deprehenderat in illorum actis (12). — For he not only promised himself an honourable acquittal, but even that he had the Victory in his Hands; but was willing that the Determination of the Cause should be protracted, that he might triumph the more splendidly. And now, changing Hands, he brought an Action of Impiety against the most sacred Order, The Monks, and Beddicks: for he had discovered some secret Transactions of theirs." See the Remark [A], of the Article B E D A, Citation (7).

[C] He was accused as an Heretic — but the Judges — acquitted him.] He was accused of condemning the Custom, which Preachers have, of invoking the Holy Virgin, instead of invoking the HOLY GHOST. It is said, that he did not approve, that the Holy Virgin should be called the Fountain of Grace, and that, in the Evening Hymn, she should be called our Hope and our Life. He said, that This was more applicable to JESUS CHRIST, and that the Scripture does not favour the Modern Usage. These are the Trifles, for which he was imprisoned, and in danger of being treated as an Heretic. Ob hujusmodi nœmias ductus est in carcerem, reus hæreseos periclitatus est. At Judices, ubi viderunt causam esse nullius momenti, absolverunt hominem (13). I do not wonder so much, that Erasmus called them Trifles, as that Berquin was acquitted upon such Opinions.

[D] He translated some of Erasmus's Books into French.] Among others, The Panegyric on Marriage (14), The Manual of the Christian Soldier (15), and The Complaint of Peace. See the Remark [K].

that, if he refused, He should himself be burnt. Being a Man of an inflexible and intrepid Spirit, he would not submit to any thing; and he would probably have been burnt, if some Judges, perceiving the excessive Animosity of the Accusers, had not contrived the Matter so, that the Business was examined again. Many are of Opinion, that this was done at the Recommendation of the Lady Regent, Mother of Francis I, to save Berquin. During these Transactions, Francis I returned from Spain; and, hearing of the Danger his Counsellor was in, from the Faction of Beda, he wrote to the Parliament to take great care of what should be done, and that he would hear Lewis de Berquin's Cause himself. Some time after, The Prisoner was set at Liberty: This raised his Courage in such a manner, that he was so bold, as to accuse his Accusers (g): He brought an Action of Irreligion against them, and flattered himself with obtaining a compleat Victory (h). If he had followed the judicious Advice of Erasmus, he would have looked upon it as a great Triumph, not to be oppressed by these Men [E], instead of hoping to bring them to Reason. But if, on the one Side, he came off the worse for having had the Boldness to resist, to their Face, Those, with whom Erasmus, for very good Reasons, advised him to have nothing to do [F]; it was, on the other side, a great Advantage to him; because, by falling a Victim to their Hatred, he procured to himself the Crown of Martyrdom. He was imprisoned the third time; the Sentence pronounced against him, condemned him to make the Amende Honorable for his Errors (i), and to suffer perpetual Imprisonment [G]. He refused to submit to This Sentence: He would have acknowledged, thereby, that his Opinions were erroneous; so that he was condemned, as an obstinate Heretic, to be strangled in the Greve (k), and afterwards burnt (l). He suffered Death with an extraordinary Constancy. He was about forty Years of Age. It is said, that the Monk, who attended him on the Scaffold, declared, that he observed in him some Signs of Abjuration [H]. But see what Eras-

[E] If he had followed the Advice of Erasmus, he would have looked upon it as a great Triumph not to be oppressed by Those Men.] Few Persons of Sense, and who are used to reflect on what they see, or read, will think on Berquin's Conduct, without applying to him the Fable of the Wolf and the Crane. He was not satisfied with having escaped out of the Hands of his Accusers, but he would also have the Prize and Honour of the Victory, as a Reward of his Constancy: Is not This to imitate the Crane, who required a Reward, after having got her Neck, whole and safe, from out of a very dangerous Passage?

[F] -- With whom Erasmus, for very good Reasons, advised him to have nothing to do.] He had received Letters from Berquin, but had never seen him; and, fearing to be involved in the Prosecutions against Innovators, he was not very well satisfied to find his own Thoughts, with Those of Berquin (18), in one and the same Book; and he exhorted the latter to be quiet, or, at least, not to expose him to Danger. "Your Adversaries, said he to him, will never own the Crime, of which you accuse them; think that Beda is an Hydra with several Heads; you have to do with an immortal Enemy; a Faculty, a Society, never dies; and do not trust to the Protection of the Prince. The Favour of Kings is changeable; an Informer prejudices them; the Fear they have of Churchmen, and their Desire of being no more fatigued with their importunate Solicitations, force them to grant them what they demand." Here are his Latin Words. "Crebris epistolis hortatus sum, ut vel arte quamvis femet extricaret a causa, puta carente amici, ut prætextu regis legationis longius proficisceretur: for-Postremo, ut nihil horum accidat, magnos etiam Principes vel delassari talium improbitate, vel metu nonnunquam cogi ut cedant (19)."

[G] The Sentence, pronounced against him, condemned him to make the Amende Honorable, and to suffer perpetual Imprisonment.] I have followed the Acta Martyrum of John Crepin; but I shall observe, wherein the Relations differ. Beza makes no mention of an Amende Honorable; and he says, that Berquin's Books were to be burnt in the Preface of the Author, which Crepin does not remark. Erasmus mentions four Heads of Punishment; the Books were to be burnt; the Author was to recant; his Tongue was to be bored through, and himself to suffer perpetual Imprisonment (20). Beza, and Crepin, have not forgot this latter Head. Erasmus adds, that the Cause was judged by twelve Commissaries; that Budaus, who was one of them, exhorted Berquin, before his Condemnation, to retract (21); that Berquin, having heard the Sentence, appealed to the King, and to the Pope, and that the Judges, full of Indignation on that Account, condemned him to be burnt the next Day. Erasmus relates all this on Hear-say (22). See the Remark [K].

[H] The Monk, who attended him on the Scaffold, declared, That he had observed in him some Signs of Abjuration.] A Person (23), whom Erasmus thought worthy of Credit, wrote to him, that he asked This Monk, If Berquin had not acknowledged his Errors, at his last Breath? And that the Monk answered him, He had; and seemed to have no manner of doubt, but that Berquin's Soul was in the Abode of the Blessed. Erasmus's Friend was near the Place of Execution, and gave him a faithful Account of it. He informed him, that no one could hear the Speech, which Berquin made to the People, the Archers making a great Noise on purpose to drown it mus said upon This [I]. Beza believed (m), that Berquin would have been, in France, what Luther was in Germany, if Francis I had done for him, what the Duke of Saxony did for Luther. It is certain, that he was a Man of great Parts, and of great Courage. Nicholas Berauld was one of his best Friends, as Badius Ascensius affirms, in dedicating the Works of Politian to them.

Since the first Impression of this Article, a Book has been published, wherein the different Proceedings against Lewis de Berquin are well cleared up. I shall give the Substance of them in the last Remark of This Article.

it: No one cried JESUS, when the Sufferer was strangled, though it be commonly practised towards sacrilegious Men, and Parricides (24). If what Beza relates were true, we should certainly find it in Erasmus's Relation: His Friend would not have kept it secret. Beza says, "that Dr Merlin, at that Time Penitentiary of Paris, who went with him to the Place of Execution, could not forbear saying aloud to the People, after his Death, to the great Regret of his Accusers, and Judges, that, perhaps, for above an hundred Years past, no one had died a better Christian, than Berquin (25)." It is probable, Beza, afterwards, discovered the Falshood of This; for, if he had believed the Thing to be true, why should he not have placed it in his Icones? It is certain, that many pious Frauds are handed about in such Cases, which an Historian ought to distrust.

[I] See what Erasmus says upon this.] He freely declares, that he believed the Franciscan, who attended Berquin on the Scaffold, told a Lie: He adds, that "it is always their Custom in such Cases. These pious Frauds serve to maintain them in the Honour of having vindicated Religion, and to justify to the People Those, who have accused and condemned Heretics." At ego Franciscani dictis nihil habeo fidei, præsertim quum hoc sit istis solenne, post extinctum hominem spargere rumores, quod in incendio cecinerit palinodiam, quo simul & vindicata religionis laudem auferant, & multitudinis invidiam calumnique suspicionem effugiant (26). He knew, from the first Hand, some of these Frauds, which had been practised at Brussels; and he relates them in few Words. If People were reasonable, they would make such Accusers and Judges stand in awe of them; for, in short, can any thing be conceived more shocking, when it is examined without Prejudice, than to represent to one's self a Man condemned to the Flames, because he will not violate the Faith, which he has sworn to the True God? But the Authors of these Executions were so far from fearing any thing on that Account, that they became more insolent for it; for they were in hopes to render themselves more formidable. This was one of the Inconveniences, which Erasmus found in the Execution of poor Berquin. Periculum est, ne Bædis sua sponte plus satis insensitibus nimium accedat animorum (27).

[K] There has appeared a Work, in which the Proceedings against Berquin are well cleared up.] It is A Treatise of the Origin of Printing at Paris, by Mr Chevallier. Thus he gives an Account of These Proceedings. The thirteenth of May, in the Year 1523, the Parliament caused Lewis de Berquin's Books to be seized, and ordered, that they should be communicated to the Faculty of Theology to have their Opinion concerning them. They found upon him the Book De Abroganda Missâ, with some others of Luther and Melancthon; and seven or eight Treatises, whereof he was the Author, some entitled, Speculum Theologistorum. De Ufu & Officio Missæ, &c. Rationes Lutheri, quibus omnes Christianos esse Sacerdotes molitur suadere; The Debate of Piety and Superstition. They found also some Books, which he had translated into French, as, The Reasons why Luther caused the Decretals, and all the Books of the Canon Law, to be publicly burnt: La Triade Romaine; and others. The Faculty, having examined these Books, judged, that they plainly contained Luther's Heresies and Blasphemies. Their Opinion is dated Friday the Twenty sixth of July, 1523, and addressed to the Court of Parliament. After having censured each Book in particular, they concluded, that all of them ought to be burnt; that Berquin, having made himself a Defender of the Lutheran Heresies, ought to be obliged to make a public Abjuration, and to be forbidden to compose any Book, for the future, or make any Translation prejudicial to the Faith (28). "The Parliament ordered, that this Opinion should be signified to him.

"He answered, in Writing, and verbally, to it, in the Presence of the Judges. Upon his Answer, he was made Prisoner, the first Day of August, and, four Days after, his Sentence was read to him, which sent him back to the Tribunal of the Bishop of Paris, to be judged by him, on the Cases resulting from the Process. The eighth of August, the King caused him to be taken out of the Prisons of the Episcopal Court, by Captain Fredéric, and brought the Cause before his Council, where he was judged by the Chancellor, and condemned to abjure some heretical Propositions; which he did. These are the Terms of the Registers of the Parliament. He was no sooner delivered from this Danger, but he began again to utter Heresies in his Books, and in his Discourse; and, to be less observed, he retired into the Diocese of Amiens, where he offended the People, and the Clergy, in such a manner, that the Bishop was obliged to come to Paris, and make his Complaint to the Parliament, who caused him to be taken up; and he was declared a Relapsed Heretic, by the Sentence of two Counsellors of the Court, chosen to take Cognizance of the Fact of Heresy, and invested with the Authority of the Holy See, by a Brief of Pope Clement VII, dated the twentieth of May, 1525, registered in the Court, which the Queen Regent had obtained from Rome, in the King her Son's Absence. These Ecclesiastical Judges gave him up to the Parliament, as to the Secular Power. His Process had been committed to a Counsellor. The Morning when it was to be reported, the Parliament received a Letter from the King, who was returned from Spain, dated the first of April, 1526, whereby he ordered the Proceedings to be stopped: And, at last, after many Letters written, he sent a Lieutenant of his Guards, with the Provost of Paris, who took him out of Jail, kept him some time in the Louvre, and gave him his Liberty (29)." The Faculty of Divinity having censured Erasmus's Colloquies, the University prohibited the reading and teaching them in the Colleges. "Then Berquin wrote to Erasmus, that the matter ought not to be delayed any longer; that he ought to join with him; that now was the time to ruin all the Authority of the Doctors in the Church, and to cry them quite down, the Occasion being favourable. Nunc tempus esse, ut Theologis omnis in posterum detraberetur auctoritas. His Cause remained in suspense. It consisted in a Sentence, pronounced against him by two Counsellors, Judges delegated by the Pope (which Erasmus ascribes to the Prior of the Carthusians, to That of the Celestins, and to a Third, whom he does not name). It consisted also in a Reproach, which he had made to the Faculty of Theology, for having approved the impious Doctrine, as he falsely called it, of Doctor Bæda. --- Puffed up with the Protection, which he had received from the Court, flattering himself with the vain Hopes of destroying the Faculty, and uttering Errors continually, he would pursue his Abolition, contrary to Erasmus's Counsels, who advised him, very wisely, to desist from this Enterprize, and to leave the Kingdom. --- Twelve Commissaries were deputed to judge him; who, having found him convicted of Heresy, caused him to be arrested. They had agreed together, that his Books should be burnt, that his Tongue should be bored, and that he should be only condemned to a perpetual Imprisonment, provided he would abjure his Heresy. The Learned William Budeus, who was one of his Judges, did his utmost, for three Days, to persuade him to save his Life, by recanting his Errors: But, not being able to conquer his Obstinacy, Sentence was pronounced against him, and he was burnt at the Grève, in the Month of April, 1529 (30)." BERSALA [A] (ANNE), Daughter, and chief Heiress, of Wolfard de Bor-selle (a), and of Charlotte de Bourbon-Montpensier (b), who were married the seventeenth of June, 1468, was the Wife of Philip of Burgundy, Son of Antony of Burgundy, Lord of Beuvres, one of the Natural Sons of Philip The Good, Duke of Burgundy (c). She brought him, for her Dowry, the Lordship of Vere [B], and that of Flushing, and some others; and had one Son, and two Daughters by him. Her own Father, and her Husband's Father, made a very great Figure [C]. This Lady's Merit, and some Passages concerning her Conduct, and her Misfortunes, shall be the Subject of our last Remark [D]. We shall, there, see, among other things, that Erasmus greatly esteemed her.

[A] BERSALA.] Thus Erasmus latinizes the vulgar Name BORSELLE.

[B] She brought her Husband the Lordship of Vere.] It is in Zealand, in the Island of Walcheren, and has been since erected into a Marquisate. It is vulgarly called Teer-Vere.

[C] Her own Father, and her Husband's Father, made a very great Figure.] For it is said (1), that Wolfard de Bor-selle's first Wife was Mary, the Daughter of James I, King of Scotland, who brought him the Country of Boncam (2); and that he was a Marshal of France (3). It is more certain he was made a Knight of the Golden Fleece (4). Lewis Gollut places him in the List, and calls him Count of Grand-Pré. Mr Fabert does the like; but I can scarce believe, that they are in the right; for I find, that Antony of Burgundy, Natural Son of Philip The Good, was made Earl of Grand-Pré, and of Chateau-thierry, by Lewis XI, in the Year 1478 (5), which is about the time that Wolfard de Bor-selle received the Collar of the Order. If we had no other Proof of the Rank he held, than his Marriage with a Daughter of Lewis of Bourbon, Earl of Montpensier, and Dauphin of Auvergne, third Son of John I, Duke of Bourbon, we could not doubt, but that he made a great Figure in the World. Let us just concerning the Father of Anne de Bor-selle. Let us say a Word of her Father-in-law, and of her Husband. Antony of Burgundy, surnamed the Great Bastard, was made Knight of the Golden Fleece in the Year 1456 (6). He obliged the Moors to raise the Siege of Ceuta; he led the Vanguard at the Battle of Grandson (7), and remained Prisoner in that of Nancy. He entered, afterwards, into the Service of Lewis XI, who gave him very fine Lands, as I have already said (8). Charles VIII granted him Letters of Legitimation in the Year 1485, and made him Knight of the Order of St Michael. From the Marriage of this Bastard of Burgundy with Mary de la Vieville, contracted in the Year 1459, proceeded Philip of Burgundy, Lord of Beuvres, who was made Admiral and Governour of Artois, and Knight of the Fleece, at Bruges, in the Year 1478. He was also provided with the Government of the Earldom of Flanders; and he married Anne de Bor-selle (9).

[D] This Lady's Merit, and some Passages concerning her Conduct. . . . shall be the Subject of our last Remark.] If we believe Erasmus, she was extremely obliging and generous. "Vivi pervenimus, says he, in a Letter dated in the Month of February, 1497, ad Annam Principem Verianam. "Quid ego tibi de hujus mulieris comitate, benig-nitate, liberalitate memorem? Scio rhetorum am-plicationes suspectas haberi solere, præsertim iis qui ejus artificii rudes non sunt. At hic me nihil allevare, imo re vinci artem nostram, mihi credas velim. Nihil unquam produxit rerum natura aut prudentius, aut candidius, aut benignius (10). — "I have lived to see Anne, Princess of Vere. Need I tell you of this Lady's Courtesy, Good-Nature, and Liberty? I know, Rhetoricians are usually suspected of Amplification, especially by those, who are not unacquainted with the Art. But, here, believe me, I exaggerate nothing; the Subject is even too great for me. Nature never produced so much Modesty, Prudence, Candor, and Humanity." He had but lately received a thousand Marks of her Kindness and Liberty. "Tam illa in nos bene-fica fuit . . . tantis illa me officiis cumulavit, nul-lis a me studis provocata (11). . . . She was so beneficent to me, she beaped so many Favours on me, unasked." The Year following, he wrote a Letter to his good Friend James Battus, who was Tutor to This Lady's only Son: See, here, in what Terms he praised her: "O te beatum, ô superis charum, si tu itos scopolos cnavigâris: si

"felicitate tuâ, quæ mihi quidem summa videtur, sine invidia frui possis. Quod ut fore confidam, dominæ virtus facit, cui supersus omnes profitos, benèque volentes esse, non dubito. Evenit mihi, mi Battus, in ista, quod in te sæpenumero solet, ut tum ardentius amare, mirarique incipiam, quum absum. Bone Deus, qui candor, quæ comitas in amplissima fortuna, quæ animi lenitas in tantis injuriis, quæ hilaritas in tantis curis; tum quæ animi constantia, quæ vitæ innocentia, quod in literatos studium, quæ in omnes affabilitas (12). — "O happy Thou, and Favourite of Heaven, if you can sail clear of these Rocks, and enjoy That Happiness, which appears to me the greatest possible, without provoking the Envy of others. That this will be your happy Lot, I cannot doubt, when I reflect on the Goodness of the Lady you serve, on whom Heaven, I am sure, will always smile. It happens to me, dear Battus, in regard to This Lady, as it is wont with respect to yourself; I begin to love, and admire, her with the greatest Ardor, when I am absent from her. Good God! What Candor, what Courtesy, amidst the amplest Fortune! What Lenity of Mind, amidst such great Injuries! What Cheerfulness amidst so many Cares! Then, what Constancy of Soul! What Innocence of Life! What Liberality to Men of Learning! What Affability to All!"

I would not mention the Letter he wrote to this same Friend, in the Year 1500, if it did not testify This Lady's Liberty to the Clergy. He wished she would make choice of him for an Object of her Bounty, since the Productions of the Pen were more lasting, than the Voice of Preachers: He adds (13), that he would go into Italy to take his Doctor's Degree, which could not be done without such Expence, as he found himself unable to support, if he did not open her Purse for his Assistance. "Ostendens quanto amplius ego sum meis literis decus dominæ altaturus, quam alii, quos alit, Theologi. Nam illi vulgaria concionantur, ego scribo quæ semper sint victura. Illi indoctè nugantes, uno aut altero in templo audiuntur: mei libri à Latinis, à Græcis, ab omni gente toto orbe legentur. Ejusmodi indoctorum Theologorum permagnam ubique esse copiam, me similem vix multis seculis inveniri; nisi forte adeò superstitiosus es, ut religio tibi sit in amici negotio mendaciolis aliquot abuti. Deinde ostendens nihilo illam pauperiorem futuram, si ut Hieronymus jam depravatus, si ut vera Theologia instauraretur, aliquot aureis adjuverit, cum tanta ex illius opibus turpissimè pereant (14). — You will shew this Lady, how much greater Honour it will be to her to be celebrated in my Writings, than in those of some other Divines, whom she supports. They preach vulgar Things; I write what will live for ever. They, illiterate Triflers, are listened to in one or two Churches at most; My Works are read by Latins, by Greeks, by every Nation in the whole World. You will tell her, that there is every where great Plenty of such illiterate Divines, but that many Ages scarce produce a single Erasmus; unless, perhaps, you make a Conscience of being a little to serve your Friend. Lastly you will shew her, that she will not be the poorer, if she contributes a little of That Gold, she is so lavish of on the most unworthy Objects, towards restoring St Jerom, now greatly corrupted, and True Divinity." She found herself embarrassed in the Year 1498, and even under a kind of Confinement. "Apud dominam Vericenis oppidi res hoc erant loco, ut nec colloqui sine summo periculo poterim, nec abire sine gravi suspitione. Noli causam Præpositi, qui ut nunc in vinculis est, ita domina in tutela (15). — The Affairs of the Princess of Vere were in such a State, that I could nei-

See the Letter, which Erasmus wrote to her in the Year 1500. I shall borrow but one Passage from it: It will inform us, that she was married very young; and that, being a Widow, after an uncomfortable Marriage, she would not marry again, though many Suitors offered themselves, with great Solicitations. "Nam te quidem non tam in viduis, quam in virginibus, pono: scilicet quod olim puella admodum nuptiis, id quidem partim parentum auctoritati, partim generi propagando datum: & ejusmodi fuit conjugium, ut non tam fit imputanda voluptas, quam patientia spectata. Now, since, in the Flower of your Youth, no Solicitation of Suitors can divert you from a determined State of Continency; since, amidst such an Affluence of Fortune, you so little indulge yourself: I esteem you rather as a Virgin, than a Widow; which State if you persist in, as I trust you will, believe me, I shall reckon you, not in the Company of young Maids, of which, the Scripture says, there is no number; not among the fourscore Concubines of Solomon; but among the fifty Queens, with the Consent, I hope, of St Jerom himself." I must lay something of her only Son Adolphus of Burgundy. He was Admiral of Flanders, and made Knight of the Golden-Fleece, at Brussels, in the Year 1516. Erasmus praised him for his good Qualities, and dedicated his Book of Virtue to him. He died at his Castle of Beves in Flanders, the seventh of December, 1540 (18). He left a Son, and two Daughters; the latter left some Posterity (19); but the Son had no Children by his Wife Louisa de Croÿ, who was Daughter of Philip de Croÿ, Duke of Archebat (20). He was made Marquis of Teer-Vere by Charles V (21); and, in the Year 1546, he received the Collar of the Order of the Golden Fleece (22). He died in the Year 1558 (23). The sixteenth Letter of the tenth Book of Erasmus is written to Adolphus of Burgundy; Principi Veriano. It is dated from London, 1512. The same Year he wrote to him, from Paris, a very excellent Letter, which is, in some Editions, at the End of the Enchiridion militis Christiani.

BERTELIER (PHILIBERT), Register of the inferior Court of Justice at Geneva, where he was born, should not have had a place in this Dictionary, had not his Article been proper to be the Supplement of another (a); and to shorten That of Calvin, which, probably, will be very long. This Bertelier lived in the middle of the XVIth Century. He distinguished himself only by his vile Actions; but, as he committed one, which pleased the Controversists much, since it supplied them with ample Matter to defame Calvin's Memory, this gave occasion to his being quoted as a Person of Consequence; and gave him a Figure in some considerable Writings (b). He pretended, that the Republic of Geneva had sent him to Noyon, with orders to make an exact Enquiry, there, into Calvin's Life and Conversation; and that, having performed his Commission, he found, that John Calvin had been convicted of Sodomy; and that, at the Bishop's Request, the Punishment of Fire was commuted into That of being branded with the Flower-de-luce. He boasted to have an Act, signed by a Notary, which certified the Truth of the Process and Condemnation. Bolsec affirms (c), that He, and many Others, had seen That Act; and This is the Ground of That horrid Accusation, so much spoken of, and which has been inserted in many Books. The matter of Fact, whether Calvin was branded with a hot Iron, for the Crime of Pederasty, is only grounded on the Authority of Bolsec, who affirms, that he saw the Act, which Bertelier brought from Noyon. We shall see, in the Article BOLSEC, that his Testimony is of no weight in Things, which are laid to Calvin's Charge. That of Bertelier cannot be better; for he was an ill Liver, and against whom Sentence of Death had been pronounced [A]; and who,

[A] He was a Person of an ill Life, and against whom Sentence of Death had been pronounced. Mr Drelincourt, Minister of Paris, will supply me with a Proof of this Fact, which the boldest Sophisters cannot deny. He has inserted the Extract of a Letter, which he received from Mr Lullin, Counsellor, and ancient Syndic of Geneva, in a Book, printed at Geneva, and licensed by the Republic (1): There are the Contents of That Extract.

"In the mean time, I shall not refuse, for your particular Satisfaction, to acquaint you with what I have learned, and what I can assure you I have just now read, in the ancient Records of our Council; wherein I find, that Philip Bertelier was a Native of This City, and had the Office of Secretary (which is elsewhere called Register) of the inferior Court of Justice; which Post is much below That of Secretary of State, which he is said to have had; and that, being accused of Sedition and Conspiracy against This State, and Church, he ran away, and, not appearing to answer for himself, was condemned, as being attainted, and convicted, of Those Crimes, to lose his Head, by a Sentence pronounced against him, the sixth of August, 1555. About two Years after, he went to Law with a private Person of this City, in a foreign Court of Justice, whither he had fled; and, it being requisite, for the Honour and Interest of our Republic, and of That private Person, to make This perfidious Man known, an Attestation was granted of the Judgment, given against him, in the Terms, which you shall see in the following Copy, dated the fifth of February, 1557. This is the true Character of Bertelier, whose Testimony is so much extolled in the Book of the late Cardinal de Richelieu. As for what concerns his being sent, or deputed, to Noyon, to make a Report of Calvin's Life, it is a Fact not only falsely supposed, and whereof no kind of Mention is made in our Records; but it is also contrary to all probability. For, besides that no Envoy, or Deputy, was ever sent from our City, upon public Business, who was not in a higher Station, than That of Bertelier; and that such Employs are only given to Counsellors of the little Council; it is notorious, as you know, that we had some considerable who, besides, had no Party against him, in Geneva, more inexorable than Calvin [B]. It is no ways necessary, in order to confute this Accusation, to make use of the just Exceptions, which invalidate the Testimony of these two Persons (d). There is, in the Act itself, an infallible Mark of Reprobation [C]; and nothing surprizes me more, than to see so great a Person, as Cardinal de Richelieu, depend on this piece of Bertelier [D], and alledge, as his principal Reason, that the Republic

"derable Persons of Noyon in our City, who retired hither, with Calvin, soon after him: And, among others, a Canon, whose Name was Mr Collement, and Mr de Normandie, Lieutenant-Civil of the City of Noyon, whose Family is still One of the most considerable among us, and from which I am descended by the Mother's Side; by whose means, it was very easy to receive all the Information, which could have been desired, without going farther. Add to this, that it is certain, This Bertelier was always Calvin's Enemy; because he had often reprimanded, and censured him for his vicious and scandalous Life; and that he had strenuously opposed his wicked and pernicious Designs. This appears by Calvin's Letters to Viretus, and to Bullinger, in the Months of September, and November, 1553; in which he cries him down as a vicious and audacious Man: Beza represents, likewise, the wicked Qualities of Bertelier, in Calvin's Life (2)."

"We, the Syndics and Council of Geneva, to All Those, to whom these Presents shall come, do certify, that, on the sixth of August, of the Year 1555, was publicly given, and pronounced, by Sound of Trumpet, a criminal Sentence against Philibert Bertelier, and his Accomplices, named in the said Sentence; by which, for the horrid and detestable Crimes of Conspiracy against the Holy Institution, and Christian Reformation, and against this City, and the public Good and Tranquillity thereof, the said Philibert Bertelier, as one of the Authors of the Conspiracy, and an Enemy to this City, and to the Peace, Union, and Tranquillity thereof, has been condemned to be bound, and brought to the Place of Champel; there to have his Head cut off; his Body to be quartered, and his Members to be set up in the four most eminent Places round about this City, for an Example to others, who shall commit such Crimes: This we attest and certify. And, therefore, we have ordered, and commanded, these Presents to be given under our usual Seal, and signed by our Secretary. Given at Geneva, the fifth of February, 1577."

[B] He had no Party against him - - - more inexorable than Calvin.] Bertelier, having been excommunicated, in the Year 1552, by the Consistory of Geneva (4), made his Complaint to the Senate. The Ministers were sent for, to give their Reasons for it; and both Parties being heard, the Senate confirmed the Excommunication. Eighteen Months after, Bertelier had recourse again to the Senate, who, after having heard Calvin's Opposition, pronounced, that Bertelier should be admitted to the Holy Sacrament. As soon as Calvin heard this News, he desired the Syndics to assemble the Senate; and, when they were met, he represented his Reasons, and concluded, with an Oath, that he would rather lose his Life, than give his Consent, that such a Man should receive the Lord's Supper (5). This is what Calvin wrote himself. His Historian will tell us more of it (6). The Clamour, which was raised against the Ministers, as if, in some respects, they had invaded the Rights of the Sovereignty, was the Reason, why the Council of Two hundred ordered, that the final Judgment of Causes of Excommunication should belong to the Senate; and that the Senate might absolve the excommunicated, as they should think fit. By virtue of this Decree, the Senate granted Letters of Absolution to Bertelier, which were sealed with the Seal of the Republic. The Sacrament was to be administered within two Days, when Calvin came to hear of what had pass; he soon resolved what to do, and preached against the Contempt of the Sacrament; he raised his Voice, lifted up his Hands, and said, that he would imitate St Chrysostom; that he would not oppose Force to Force, but that he would rather suffer himself to be massacred, than that his Hands should present the Holy Mysteries to Those, who had been judged unworthy of them: This was a Thunder-bolt, which confounded Bertelier's Faction; so that it was not thought fit, that he should present himself to the Communion. The next Day after the Sacrament, Calvin, accompanied by his Consistory, desired leave of the Senate, and of the Council of Two hundred, to speak to the People about this Matter, for as much as it concerned the Abrogation of a Law, made by the People. This made so great an Impression on the People's Minds, that it was resolved the Swiss Cantons should be consulted about it; and that the Decree of the Two hundred should be suspended; but that none should say, that the ancient Regulations had been in the least infringed. In eam sententiam animis non mediocriter immutatis itum est, ut suspensio illo Diaconorum decreto statueretur petendum esse a quatuor civitatibus Helveticis judicium, nec interea prejudicium ullum fieri receptis legibus oportere (7). By this means the Consistory obtained a complete Victory, and, in a manner, made the Senate, and the Council of Two hundred, buckle to. What would they not have done in a Democratical Country? Is it possible to rule over Men, who tell the People, from the Pulpit, that they had rather suffer themselves to be killed, than consent, that Holy Things should be profaned? St Chrysostom's Example, properly alledged, is an artful way of threatening the Government with an Insurrection.

[C] There is, in the Act itself, an infallible Sign of Reprobation.] No one knows when it was drawn up, or by whom, or the Names of the Witnesses, or, in general, any of the Circumstances, which are never forgotten, except when People fear to supply Those with Arms, whose Interest it is to deny a Thing. What I am going to say, carries a much greater Force with it. If Bertelier's Act had not been supposititious, there would have been, at Noyon, authentic and public Testimonies of the Trial, and Punishment, in question; and, therefore, They would have been published, as soon as the Catholic Religion began to suffer by Calvin's Means. Unless we suppose a continual, and more unheard of Miracle, than was ever yet known, All the Inhabitants of Noyon would not have kept the Secret, and spared the Reputation of a Countryman of theirs, who was so odious to them (8). I carry this Thought farther in another place (9), and therefore leave it here as it is. I add, that, if what Bertelier said was true, he would have had his Paper, when he fled from Geneva; I mean, that his pretended Commission would have preceded the Matter, for which he was condemned to death in the Year 1555; for it is plain, that he had not the Commission, he boasted of, after That time. But can any one believe, that, before the Year 1555, when Those, who were called Heretics, durst not shew themselves, for fear of being burnt, a Deputy from Geneva should go boldly to Noyon, to inform himself of Calvin's Life? Who will believe, that, if Bertelier had had an authentic Act of Calvin's Infamy in the Year 1554, he would have kept it so close, that the Public should have no knowledge of it before the Year 1577? Was it not a Piece, which the Clergy of France would have bought for it's weight in Gold? But why do I lose time in confuting such a ridiculous Romance, as This is?

[D] It is surprizing to see Cardinal de Richelieu depend on This Piece of Bertelier.] "That, says be (10), which ought to pass for an undeniable Conviction of the Crimes, imputed to Calvin, is, that ever since he was charged with This Accusation, the Church of Geneva has neither proved the contrary, nor even denied the Report, which Bertelier, sent by Those of That City, made at Noyon. This Report was signed by the most eminent Persons of the City of Noyon, and made with all usual Forms of Justice: And by the same Report it appears, that That Arch-Heretic, having been convicted of an abominable Sin, punishable only by Fire, the Punishment, which he had deserved, public of Geneva did not undertake to shew the Falshood of This Piece [E]. This is not a Place to examine, whether they had reason to make light of This Lie [F]. There is no Article of a Dictionary more useful to a Reader, than This [G].

"was, by the Intercession of his Bishop, commuted into That of the Flower-de-luce. And the Church of Geneva, which does not deny This Report concerning Calvin's Life, would not have failed to have done it, if they had believed, that it could have been done without offending against Truth." Is it not strange, that a chief Minister of State, whose Credit was not inferior to That of the King, should depend on a blind A&T, which an inconsiderable Physician of Lyons had pretended to have seen in the Hands of a mean Person? An inconsiderable private Man must, then, have had more credit, than Cardinal de Richelieu, to find out the old Records of Noyon? The Truth is, This Cardinal made all imaginable Enquiry into the pretended Proceedings against John Calvin, at Noyon, and that he discovered nothing (11); and yet he maintained the Affirmative on the Credit of Jerome Bolsec. Can such a strange Conduct be excused? Mr Drelincourt cannot believe, that That great Man was guilty of it, and lays all the Blame on Those, who published the Book, entitled, Metode pour convertir, &c (12).

THAT the Silence of an accused Person concludes nothing in certain Cases. Some curious Examples of This.

[E] --- And alledge, as his chief Reason, That the Republic of Geneva did not undertake to shew the Falshood of this Piece.] In the foregoing Remark, we have set down Cardinal Richelieu's own Words: They shew, that he lays his Strefs on the Silence of the Republic of Geneva. Mr Drelincourt shews him, by some plain Instances, that there is nothing more false, nor more absurd, than to pretend, that They, who suffer an Accusation to be spread abroad against themselves, give occasion to believe, that They are convinced it is well-grounded. The first of these Examples is Cardinal Richelieu himself; "That Those, who could not bear his Elevation, and his Power, said strange things of him; and that some of Those Things have been published, and some Books have been filled with them. Because no Juridical Information has been made to justify the contrary, must we therefore believe, that the Relations of That Illustrious Cardinal, and Those, who honour his Memory, look upon Those Things as certain Truths (13)?" Rivetus, Professor of Divinity at Leyden, made use of the like Reasoning, in answer to an Objection of Leffius, taken from the Silence of Calvin's good Friends. "Itane? Ergo quotiescunque liberit infami alicui agyrtæ crimina consingere in viros bonos, necessariūne erit libellos illos famulos discutere, ut homines isti, si tamen homines, qui famam accipiuntur ex adversariorum nomine, applaudant sibi, quod tandem repererint qui se cum illis voluerint componere, & existimarent talia esse responſione digna, quæ contemptu potius erant diluenda (14). — What! Shall it be necessary, as often as an infamous Fellow invents an Accusation against Good Men, to refute his libellous Books; and thus give such Men, if they deserve the Name of Men, who build their own Fame on the Reputation of their Adversaries, an Opportunity of triumphing, in that they have found Persons, who will enter the Lists with Them, and think Those Things worthy of an Answer, which deserve to be refuted rather with Contempt?" Here is a Jesuit, who agrees perfectly with These Ministers. How long is it, since it is not allowable to be silent, without being looked upon as convicted of the Crimes, which are imputed to us? It does not appear, that This is the Opinion of the Wifeit, and of Those, whose Example may serve as a Rule to others. Who is ignorant, how many foolish things the Enemies of France are used to publish against it, in their Gazettes, and Libels? Who does not know how many infamous and abominable Reports Mr Jurieu has spread against the Popes, and against the Church of Rome, in his Parallel, in his Prejugez, and in so many other Books, with which he fills the World? So that, if the King does not keep Persons on purpose to confute These Foreign Gazettes, in every Particular; and if none are to be found among the Calumniators, who will lose their Time in confuting, actually, these idle Fancies of Mr Jurieu, that "the Popes have pretended to Universal Monarchy; that, in order to it, they have occasioned a Schism between the Greeks and the Latins; that, afterwards, to end the Quarrel, they have --- &c." I say, unless the King, or the Pope, take care to have these Fooleries, and Slanders, refuted, will not the Gazetteer of Holland, and Mr Jurieu, have reason to say, They dare not answer; there is therefore reason to believe, they cannot do it? Would the Author of the Morale Pratique have condemned them upon such an Account? I am willing to believe, he would be ashamed to own it. Why, then, might not the Jesuits neglect to answer Libels, which are, in their Opinion, no less fabulous, nor less delpicable, than the Gazettes of Amsterdam, and the Historical or Prophetical Systems of Mr Jurieu? Ought they to be more nice in Point of Reputation, than Those, whom God has placed over us? Ought they not, or at least may they not, after These great Examples, despise what concerns only their particular Honour (15)?"

[F] This is not a Place to examine, whether They had reason to make Light of This Lie.] Mr Drelincourt, and Father le Tellier's, Maxim is in general very good and true; but there are some particular Cases, wherein it is better not to make use of it. I shall not decide whether the Republic of Geneva had done better to make a public Declaration against Bolsec, in relation to the pretended Deputation of Bertellier. It seems at first fight, that the Advantage, which the Catholic Controversists have pretended to draw from the Silence of That Republic, shews, that they were in the wrong to be silent, I mean, not to make it appear, by a public Act, that These Persons were impudent Liars: But They, who consider, that nothing can stop the Pens of a Sort of Men, and that, if you silence them in one Point, they will turn to something else, will easily perceive, that an Act of the Republic of Geneva would not have ended This Dispute. I agree to the Maxim, that, sometimes, the best way to be revenged of an impudent Calumniator, is to return him no Answer (16). However I believe, that Beza did not well apply this Maxim, when he made use of it in relation to Bolsec. An Answer would have puffed him up with Vanity; and he would have concluded from it, that his Slanders had touched the Protestants to the quick, which would have filled him with Joy. I grant it: But it had been better to have let him enjoy This Pleasure, attended with the infamous Character of a public Calumniator, with which a good Answer would have branded him, than to give him, and others, a Pretence to boast, that the Republic could not deny the Matter in question. Qui tacet consentire videtur. Those Truths, which are called Maxims, no less clash with each other, than Errors, and Truths.

[G] There is no Article of a Dictionary more useful to a Reader, than This.] One of the greatest Uses, which may be drawn from Reading, is, to learn the Weaknesses of the Heart of Man, and the ill Effects of Prejudices in Point of Religion. Can there be a more remarkable Instance of it, than This? What must not a Man naturally be, or what will he not become, by a blind and furious Zeal for Religion, since a Monk, who turned a Protestant Physician, and afterwards a Popish Physician, and who was expelled two or three times, with a Brand of Infamy, from the Places where he was settled, no sooner produces an Accusation on the Credit of a Fugitive, condemned to death, upon refusing to appear before his Judges, an Accusation, than which none was ever worse contrived, and worse proved, but it is adopted, and conveyed from Book to Book; a thousand Consequences are drawn from it; and Authors of the first Rank, the great Cardinal Richelieu himself, propose it to the Heretics as a powerful Motive of Conversion: And all this propter majorem Dei gloriam? O QUANTUM EST IN REBUS INANE (17)!

BERTRAM (CORNELIUS BONAVENTURA), born at Thouars, in Poitou, was a considerable Man, in the XVIth Century, for his Knowledge in the Oriental Languages. He studied Hebrew at Paris, under Angelus Caminus, and, afterwards, at Cabors, with the Civilian Francis Roaldus. He had much ado to avoid being massacred, at Cabors, in the Year 1572; but, at last, he made his escape, and fled to Geneva; where, at the end of two Years, he was made Hebrew Professor, in the room of Rodolphe Cevalier. He wrote several considerable Books, during his abode at Geneva [A], and continued to apply himself to his Studies, when he went to Frankenthal, in the Palatinate. He published a Book, there, in the Year 1586, entituled, Lucubrationes Frankenthalenses. He left That Post to go to Lausanne, where the Magistrates of Bern offered him a Professorship, which he exercised 'till his Death, which happened in the Year 1594. He was in his climacterical Year, when he died (a), by which we may judge, that he was born in the Year 1531. It must not be forgot, that he was a Minister, and that he exercised That Office in Geneva (b); where he married Genevieve Denoffe, Niece of Beza's first Wife, in whose House she had been educated from her Youth. She was very tenderly beloved by her Aunt (c). Bertram was a good Critic, as Beza, Casaubon, and several other learned Persons, have publickly acknowledged (d).

[A] He wrote several considerable Books during his abode at Geneva. He published the Thysaurus of Sanctus Pagninus, with Additions, part whereof he took out of the Writings of Mercerus and Cevalier, and the rest he supplied out of his own Stock. He published, also, a Comparatio Grammaticæ Hebraicæ & Aramicæ, and a Treatise de Politia Judaica. Thuanus knew no more of them: He places this last Treatise above the other Books, composed by This Author. Qui ex omnibus ejus operibus maxime commendatur (1). He might have added, that Bertram contributed, as much as any one, to the Edition of the Commentary of Mercerus on the Book of Job. This is acknowledged in the Preface; "Cæterum ne sua quidem laude fraudandus Cornelius noster videtur, ejusdem Merceri quondam discipulus & nunc meus in hac Ecclesia Collega. Huic siquidem non parva ex parte debetur istius libri editio, cum vix alius reperiri potuisset videretur, qui hæc à Mercero minutissimis characteribus ac fugientibus penes literis in adversariis descripta nec consequeretur (2). — Nor must we deny due Praise to our Cornelius Bertram, formerly a Disciple of Mercerus, and at present my Colleague in This Church; to whom we are not a little indebted for the Publication of This Book; there being scarce any other Person capable of deciphering the exceedingly small, and almost invisible, Characters of Mercerus in his Adversaria." Mr Simon mentions another Work of Bertram; he says, that This Professor, assisted by Beza, la Faye, Rotan, Jaquemot, and Goulart, revised the French Translation of the Bible in the Year 1588, and that, being more learned in the Hebrew Tongue, than all those, who had preceded him, he took a great deal more Liberty in the Reformation, which he made, both in the Translation, and in the Notes (3). What Mr Simon says farther concerning This Revision, is not only to be found in his Critical History, but also in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary. I observe, that, according to Thuanus, the Work, entituled Lucubrationes Frankenthalenses (4), was published in the Year 1586, and entituled so, because the Author lived at Frankenthal. How then, may it be said to me, could he have a hand in the Revision, which was made at Geneva, in the Year 1581. This is no difficulty at all. When Mr Simon says, that another Reformation of the Translation of Geneva was made in the Year 1588, he intends only to mark the Date of the Impression, and does not pretend, that the whole Work was done in the Year 1588. It is well known, that such Revisions commonly take up several Years. So that Bertram might have been the chief Director of This, though it was not printed 'till a long time after he was gone from Geneva. I add, that he was, particularly, the Author of the Figures of This Bible, and of their Explication (5). These Words of the Preface, prefixed to This Bible, must therefore be understood of Him. "We have also added some Figures, but at the end, and out of the Body of this Work, which may serve for the understanding of several Passages, wherein a learned Person of our Society, who is very well versed in the Hebrew Tongue, and in the reading of the Old Testament, has been particularly concerned." Mr Colomies has applied them to our Bertram (6).

BERULLE (PETER de), Cardinal, and Founder of the Fathers of the Oratory in France, was born the 4th of Febr. 1575, and died the 2d of October, 1629 (a). You will find many Particulars concerning him in Moreri's Dictionary, and in Mr Perreault's Illustrious Men; but you will not find, in either of them, that he was exposed to the Lash of the Carmelites [A], who industriously decried him as a very dishonest Man; nor that he opposed the Design, which Cardinal Richelieu had formed, of humbling

[A] He was exposed to the Lash of the Carmelites. This is what I have read in a Book of the Bishop of Bellei (1). "Mr de Berulle, being Superior of the Oratory — was made Superior, by Delegation and Commission from the Pope, of certain Nuns of great Piety and Edification (2), whom he had brought from Spain, and introduced into France. The Monks of the same Order, who wanted to have the Direction of Them, clamoured loudly both at Rome, and in France. But, failing of Success (because, at the Court of Rome, The Direction of Nuns by Monks is held in Abhorrence, for Reasons, which Experience sufficiently evinces) they set themselves to libel him; they called him Anti-Pope, concealed Huguenot, impious Wretch, Libertine; in short, they threw the most scandalous Reflexions upon him. They accused his Morals, censured his Doctrine, and blackened his Reputation every way; at last, These Contradictions, by a wonderful Providence of God, who can bring Good out of Evil, and

"Light out of Darkness, gave birth to those excellent Works of the State and Glories of JESUS, "and That of his Life; which dazzled the Eyes "of his Adversaries, and struck them dumb." Some of them arrived to such a Pitch of Rashness and Presumption as to maintain, that the Pope could not give the Direction of Nuns to any but Monks of the same Order (3).

There is, among the Works of Cardinal Berulle, a Narrative of the Quarrel, which The Carmelites had with him. Their Pretence was a certain Memorial, which he had drawn up, by way of Formula for a new kind of Vow (4). It was a Vow of Servitude to JESUS CHRIST, and the Virgin Mary. This Author did not answer their Writings; but he composed a Discourse Of the State and Glories of JESUS, as an Apology for his Memorial. "Instead of Answer, and Reply, says he (5), "after ten Years of Patience and Silence, after three "Years of Storms and Tempests, raised in France and "Italy, by Spirits fit for this Employ, after many humbling the House of Austria [B]; nor that it was pretended, that he died by Poison [C]. What I shall say of the Edition of his Works will rectify an Oversight of Moreri [D]. I shall refute, likewise, an Error of Mr Perrault [E]. Cardinal Berulle had a Brother, a Counsellor of State, one of whose Grand-sons was Master of the Requests, Intendant at Lyons, and afterwards First President of the Parliament of Grenoble (b). The Brother of this latter was called The Abbot de Berulle, and was Master of the Requests, and Prior of St Romain du Puy, near Lyons, and died about the End of the Month of June, 1704 (c).

"Calumnies, and six injurious and diffamatory Libels, industriously spread, even in foreign Countries; I produce This Discourse in Evidence, and produce it, not to speak of their Persons, their Designs, their Conduct; but, to speak of JESUS."

[B] He opposed the Design - - - of humbling the House of Austria. He was seconded by Marillac, Keeper of the Seals, and by some other Members of the Privy-Council of Mary de Medicis (6). The Reasons, which They alledged, against succouring the Duke of Mantua, are to be found in Mr Le Vassor (7), who adds; "Berulle, a Man, whose Politics are of a Religious Turn, displayed them in a Council of the Queen-Mother, and supported them by the false Arguments, which his mystical Divinity, and his Imagination, naturally lively and fertile, suggested to him in Abundance. The Keeper of the Seals listened to him, as to a Prophet inspired from Heaven. Berulle spoke to him after his own Heart. - - - Certain Carmelite Nuns of the Fauxbourg St Jacques, great Visionaries, whom Berulle, their Director, the Keeper of the Seals, and the Queen-Mother, consulted as Oracles, greatly applauded the Project (8). God had revealed to them, in their Prayers, and their Extasies, that such was his Will (9)." We shall see, in the following Remark, how This Historian excuses his Wishing, that the House of Austria might not be humbled.

The Political Will of Cardinal de Richelieu shews us the Partiality of Cardinal Berulle for Spain. I shall cite This Passage. "Your Majesty (it is Cardinal Richelieu, who addresses himself to Lewis

(10) might, by this means, have for ever freed the Grifons from the Tyranny of the House of Austria, if Fargis, your Embassador in Spain, had not, at the Solicitation of Cardinal Berulle, without your Knowledge, and contrary to the express Orders of your Majesty (as he has since confessed), made a very disadvantageous Treaty, to which you at last adhered, to please the Pope, who pretended to have some Interest in This Affair (10)." The Abbot Richard cites these Words, in his History of Father Joseph, after having said, that "The Treaty, made by the Lord du Fargis, - - - was disclaimed, because he had not followed the Instructions of Father Joseph (11)." He adds, that it was resolved in the King's Council, to take no notice of this Fault of du Fargis; but that, "instead of ratifying what he had done, another Project should be sent him, agreeable to which he might rectify the first; which The Embassador accordingly executed (12)."

[C] It was pretended, that he died by Poison

"He died suddenly, as he was saying Mass - - - This Accident made it suspected, by several, that Richelieu had poisoned him. The Duke of Orleans infatuates This in a Letter to the King. Cardinal Berulle, my Cousin, says Gossin, did me very great Service, in my Reconciliation with the Queen my Mother. But it proved fatal to him, since his Death followed so soon after". Is not This to carry the Malignity too far? Berulle was "in a languishing Condition more than a Year. The noble Paris, in him, were found injured, and corrupted. Perhaps the Censorious might look upon it as the Effect of a slow Poison, sent him by Richelieu, who was chagrined at his Rise. However it be, Berulle was universally acknowledged to be a perfectly good Man. If he was out in his Politics, it was owing to the Tenderness of his Conscience, and to a false Zeal for Religion, which made him sincerely think, that his Opinion was more advantageous to the Good of the State, and the Re-establishment of the Remp Worship in France, and other Countries (13)." Observe, that Le Vassor neither rejects, nor adopts, the Calumny of the Cardinal's Enemies. It is a Sign he did not think it very probable.

[D] What I shall say of the Edition of his Works will rectify an Oversight of Mr Moreri Part of the Works of Cardinal Berulle had been printed at different Times during his Life; the other Part was found among his Manuscripts (14). Francis Bourgoin, at the Request of the Fathers of the Oratory, whose General he was, caused them to be collected into one Body (15). Father Gibieux, who knew more of them than any other, ranged them in order, and enriched them with Arguments and Summaries (16). They were printed at Paris, in the Year 1644, in Folio; and a second Edition was published at the same Place, in 1657, in Folio. Father Bourgoin (17) dedicated them to the Queen-Regent, Anne of Austria; and added a Preface, which is not, as Mr Moreri pretends, an Abridgement of the Life of Berulle, but rather an Eulogy on his Piety, and a general Idea of his Works.

[E] I shall refute an Error of Mr Perrault. He affirms, that Cardinal Berulle, having conducted the Princess Henrietta Maria into England, gained there the Love and Veneration of every one (18). Yet we read, as follows, in a Letter, which This Cardinal wrote to That Princess, the Twenty sixth of October, 1625. "The Duke of Buckingham is pleased to make great Complaint to the King, by his Confident Mr Gerbieres, who arrived ten or twelve Days after me, that I had conspired, and attempted, in England, against his Life and Fortune (19)."

BEVERNINGK (JEROM), was one of the ablest Men, of the XVIIth Century, for Embassies, and important Negotiations. He was originally descended from a noble Family of Prussia [A]; but he was born at Tergou, in Holland, the Twenty fifth of April, 1614. That Town, which boasts, with reason, of having produced so great a Man, saw him in the Number of it's Counsellors, in the Year 1645; and in the Number of it's Burgomasters, in the Year 1668. He was deputed by it, in the Year 1646, to the States of the Province, where he gave such good Proofs of his Capacity, that, not long after, they employed him in Affairs of Consequence.

In

[A] He was originally descended from a noble Family of Prussia. His Grandfather, John Van BEVERNINGK, a Gentleman of Prussia, came into Holland in the Year 1575, with the Count de Hohenlo. The States gave him a Company of Foot. He was made afterwards Lieutenant-General of the Artillery. He married the Daughter of Dirck Long, Burgomaster of the City of Tergou, and Treasurer General of the Province of Holland. From This Marriage proceeded Melchior Van BEVERNINGK, Captain of Foot in the Service of the States General, and Commander of the Castles of Argenteau and Dalem. He married Sibylla Standert, Daughter of Leonard Standert, Esq; Captain of Foot, and Governor of Knodjburgh, over against Nimegen, and of Catherine Hauffart, Daughter of Francis Hauffart, Chamberlain to the Queen of Hungary. Our Mr Van Beverningk proceeded from the Marriage of Melchior Van Beverningk, and Sibylla Standert.

[B] The

In the Year 1650, the States of Holland deputed him, with Mr Van Brederode, to the States of Utrecht, to desire them to be at the Extraordinary Assembly of the United Provinces, which was to be held at the Hague. In 1651, the same States of Holland deputed him to assist at That Great Assembly of the United Provinces. In the Year 1653, the City of Tergou deputed him to the Assembly of the States General. The same Year, he was sent to the Protector, and the Republic, of England, in the Quality of Deputy Extraordinary: The Year following, This Character was changed into That of Embassador Extraordinary. He concluded the Peace between Holland and England, the Twenty eighth of April, 1654. During the Course of this Embassy, he had the Office of Treasurer General of the United Provinces conferred upon him. He possessed it 'till the Year 1665; and it was his own Fault that he held it no longer; for the States General desired him to continue in That Office, and did not consent to the laying down his Commission; 'till they saw, that neither their Reasons, nor their Intreaties, could prevail upon him. He received a very advantageous Testimony, that they were perfectly satisfied with his Conduct; and they gave him, in particular, some Marks of the Esteem they had for his Person (a). In the Year 1659, he had the good Fortune to contribute, with other Deputies, to the composing the Differences, which were raised in the Province of Groningen. It may be said, that he was born for this kind of good Fortune; which appears by the many Treaties of Peace, or Alliance, which he concluded [B]. He was twice sent to Cleves, in the Year 1666. The first Time, he concluded a very strict Alliance with his Electoral Highness of Brandenburg (b); the second time, he concluded a Peace with the Bishop of Munster (c). The Year following, being invested with the Character of Embassador, he concluded the Treaty of Peace with England, at Breda (d). In 1668, he was sent in the Quality of Embassador Extraordinary to Aix la Chapelle, for the Treaty of Peace between France and Spain; which Treaty was concluded the second of May. In the same Year 1668, he was nominated to go, with Prince Maurice of Nassau, in the Quality of Embassador Extraordinary to the Emperor; but the States General changed their Mind as to That Embassy. The States of Holland gave Mr Van Beverningk some Marks of their Regard for his important Services (e). In the Year 1671, he went to the Court of Spain, in the Quality of Embassador Extraordinary, to dispose his Catholic Majesty to a Negotiation about his Differences with France, and he succeeded in it to the Satisfaction of his Masters. In the Year 1672, he followed the Prince of Orange to the Army, as Deputy of the States. After this he had a Mind to live a quiet Life, and thought he ought to be satisfied with the Glory he had acquired, and that he had performed all that a good Subject owes to his Country; but his Country wanted him too much to let him enjoy a retired Life. The redoubled Instances of the States, and of the Prince of Orange, obliged him, in the Year 1673, to engage himself in one of the most important Negotiations, that had yet occurred. I mean the Conferences at Cologne. At first, the City of Aix la Chapelle had been chosen, to negotiate the Peace between the Princes, who were then at War; but it was found more proper to go to Cologne. Mr Van Beverningk appeared there with the Character of Embassador Extraordinary. The carrying off of the Prince of Furstenberg produced the Effect, which was expected from That bold Attempt, viz. the breaking off of the Conferences in relation to France. Nevertheless, the Negotiation was continued with the Allies of that Crown; and it was done with all manner of Success; for Mr Van Beverningk brought the Elector of Cologne, and the Bishop of Munster, back again into the Alliance of the States General (f). He was made Curator of the University of Leyden, in the Year 1673. It is an Office, which is not commonly given but to Those, who have served their Country in great Employments. When he expected to enjoy the Repose, which he had so long wished for, he found himself engaged in a most difficult Negotiation: He was so earnestly solicited to go to Nimegen, in the Quality of Embassador Plenipotentiary from the Republic, for the General Peace, that, after having excused himself several times, he could not refuse That important and laborious Commission. The Obstacles, which he was to overcome, cannot be expressed:

(a) The Character of Deputy Extraordinary was changed into that of Embassador Extraordinary.

(b) Feb. 16, 1666.

(c) April 17, 1666.

(d) July 31, 1666.

(f) The Treaty of Peace with the Bish. of Munster was signed April 22, 1674; and That with the Elector of Cologne, the 11th of May following.

[B] The many Treaties of Peace, or Alliance, which he concluded. Here is a Passage, which, in a long Parenthesis, will serve as a Commentary upon these Words. "Monfieur Pattius (1) being Embassador in Spain, and having, by his great Capacity, preserved, and increased, in the Queen of Spain, and her Council, the good Impressions, which Monfieur Van Beverningk (a Man born to make Peace in the World, having given it, in Cromwel's Time, and afterwards at Breda, to the English, and Dutch, at Cleves to the Bishop of Munster, at Aix la Chapelle to the French and Spaniards, and, lately, at Cologne, to the Archbishop of Cologne, and to the Bishop of Munster, and having not a little contributed to the Peace, lately made with England, and who, for that reason, might well be called the Peace-Maker) had made "upon them, to oppose early, by just and effectual Means, the Ambition of the French; Stoupe does not know any other way of revenging himself upon him, but by Calumny, and falsely accusing him of being an Arminian. He is also foolishly afraid, that, if Mr Pattius should go through Switzerland, he would not come off very cheap. I am sure, that, if he should happen to pass by that Country, the Swiss, as well the Protestant, as the Catholic, Cantons, would receive him with their usual Civility, and with the Respect due to his Character, and to his great Merit, and that they would give him public Thanks for having so much contributed to the Preservation of Religion, and the Liberty of Europe." This is to be found in an Answer, which was made to Mr Stoupe's Letter about the Religion of the Dutch (2).

(1) It should be Pattius. It is the name of a marginal Note of the Art. de SAINT-CEPES. Remark [F].

pressed: A less consummate Industry and Experience, than His, could never have compassed it; for, except the French Embassadors, almost all the rest made it much more their Business to retard the Treaty of Peace, than to advance it. Nevertheless, after the taking of Ghent, it seemed, that the Peace was become, at last, a necessary Evil for Holland; and People were so sensible of the fatal Consequences, which the taking of That Place might have, that they ardently desired an end of the War. Mr Van Beverningk had Orders to go to the King of France, at his Camp of Wetteren (g); and, after the Reception he met with [C], it was no longer doubted, but that a Peace would be concluded. It was signed, between France and Holland, the tenth of August, 1678; after which, Mr Van Beverningk served effectually, as a Mediator, to conclude That between France and Spain, the eleventh of September, in the same Year. He also concluded a Treaty of Peace, and of Commerce, between Sweden, and the States General, the twelfth of October, 1679. After so many honourable, and happy, Negotiations, he enjoyed, at last, That quiet Life, which he had so long wished for. He retired to a fine Lordship (b), which he had, a small League from Leyden, where he chiefly employed himself in the Culture of all sorts of Plants, which he sent for from all Parts of the World. But this pleasant and innocent Occupation, so like That, which some great Princes have betaken themselves to, after their Triumphs, and the Government of the State, did not hinder him from regarding the Common-Wealth of Learning. He exercised his Function of Curator of the University, with great Vigilance. He felt the beginning of his last Sickness, a little after having spent one Morning in perusing the Manuscripts of the famous Library of Isaac Vossius, which had lately been bought for the University of Holland (i). As soon as he was got into his Coach again, he began to shudder. This was the beginning of a Fever, which encreased daily, and of which he died, the thirtieth of October, 1690, at the Age of Seventy six Years. His Wife survived him (k); but he had no Children by her; so that as he was an only Son, no Person remains to bear his Name, in this Country. He was buried at Tergou, in a Marble Chapel, which he had built. His Relations caused his Epitaph to be engraved on a Touchstone. It is a fine Inscription, which may be seen entire in the Remark [D]. It contains an Abridgment of a Life, which might fill [C] The Reception he met with from the King of France.] See the Answer, which the King of France gave to the Letter of the States General, and the Memorial, which he ordered to be delivered to Mr Van Beverningk, with the same Answer. There is nothing in it, but what tends to facilitate the Advancement of the Peace; the Style is mild and civil; and many Advances are made in it. Every Body may be convinced of it (3). There was a particular Circumstance in This Embassy, which is not known, but deserves to be so. It shews, on one side, the Distinction, with which the King of France regarded the Person, who had been sent to him, and, on the other side, with what Principles of Honour, and Disinterestedness, Mr Van Beverningk behaved himself. When he came away from Wetteren, the King would make him a Present of two of his Pictures, enriched with Jewels, each of which were worth about Eight hundred Livres. It is not usual to give two Pictures, but one only. He answered the Person, who offered him This Present from the King, that he thanked His Majesty for the Honour; but that he did not think proper to accept of it. Nevertheless, he made a Present to the Bearer of the two Pictures, as if he had accepted of Them. The King's Letter to the States contains, among other things, that the Sieur Van Beverningk's Person and Conduct had been very acceptable to him.

The very Illustrious and Noble

JEROM VAN BEVERNINGK;

Lord of Teilingen;

Senator, Judge, and Counsellor, of Tergou;

Deputy in the General Assembly of the States;

Sometimes Deputy Extraordinary;

Treasurer General of the United Provinces;

Curator of the University of Leyden;

Assistant in settling the Boundaries of Spain, and the United Provinces.

Deputy of the States in the Army of William III.

Sent Plenipotentiary to

Westminster, To Cleves twice, To Breda,

To Aix la Chapelle, To Brussels, To Madrid,

To Cologne, To the French King,

Encamped at Wetteren.

Appointed Ambassador to the Emperor,

He returned not, 'till he had finished his Negotiation.

Consulted, with success,

fill a whole Volume ; and, if Mr Van Beverningk had taken the pains to compose some Memoirs concerning his Embassies, it would be the most instructive, and most curious Book, that could be seen. He always succeeded in his Negotiations ; which is an Honour, whereof we find but few Examples among those, who have had the Management of so many public Affairs. He was laborious and industrious, and never discouraged at any thing (1). The French and Dutch Writers equally praise him. I could alledge many Proofs of it ; but shall be satisfied with producing what Mr de Wicquefort [E], and Mr de Saint Didier [F], have said of him. As for Sir William Temple, he seems to be a little vexed at the signing of the Treaty of Nimègen ; but, notwithstanding, he owns, that Mr Van Beverningk put a Stop to the Complaints of his Enemies (m). He might have said, that the Magistrates of Amsterdam wrote a very obliging Letter to him, in which they thanked him for the Conclusion of the Peace (n). They assured him, that they had taken much Pains with the Members of the States of Holland, that he might be employed in That Negotiation. They knew very well, that they stood in need of such a Man, as He, to make it succeed. The Town, where he was born, shewed him, upon that Occasion, how much they esteemed him. The City of Tergou made him a Present of two Silver Handirons, in the Year 1679, in Consideration of the last Treaty of Peace, and for other important Services, done to the State and the City.

DEATH IS A DEBT WE ALL MUST PAY.

[E] What Mr Wicquefort ——— said of him.] “ Jerom Beverningk is, doubtless, one of the ablest “ Men of the United Provinces for Negotiations. “ The City of Tergou, which otherwise does not “ want able Men, deputed him several times to the “ Assemblies of the States of the Province of Holland, and to the Colleges of the Generality, and he “ always perfectly answered what might be expected “ from his great Ability. It was He, who, in the “ Year 1654, made the Treaty with Oliver Cromwell, which gave Peace to the United Provinces ; “ but it had like to have involved them in a Civil “ War, because the Interests of the Prince of Orange, “ according to some, had not been well managed in “ it. The Province of Holland was so well satisfied “ with the Service he did them at That Juncture, “ that They procured him the Office of Treasurer “ General, that is to say, of first Minister of the “ United Provinces. There is no Affair, though “ ever so difficult, but what he can clear up, when “ he will apply himself to it. If any one desires “ proofs of it, he need only look into the Treaty, “ which he concluded at Cleves, with the Bishop of “ Munster, in the Year 1666. Nor was He less “ successful in his Negotiations at Madrid, concerning the important Interests of the Provinces of the “ Netherlands. If he did not succeed at Cologne, it “ must be imputed to the Ill-disposition of the Parties “ concerned, and to the unlucky Juncture of Affairs, “ rather than to his Way of managing Things. Hence “ it is, that he was intrusted with the whole Nego- “ tiation at Nimègen; and the States made choice of “ him to go, and conclude it with the most Christian “ King near Ghent. He is weary of so many Em- “ ployments; so that, whereas others strive for them, “ he avoids them; choosing rather to enjoy himself “ in his Country Retirement, than to be troubled “ with the Cares, which Business brings upon him, “ and which are often no less troublesome to him, “ than to Those, who negotiate with him. A bet- “ ter Pen, than mine, is requisite to draw up Mr Van “ Beverningk’s Character, because, if all the Parts of “ it be well examined, it will be found, that, abating “ his uneven Temper, there is nothing in him, but “ what is Excellent (1).”

[F] ——— and Mr de Saint Didier.] Of all the “ Places, where this Author speaks of Mr Van Bever- “ ningk, I shall select but these three. “ Mr Van Be- “ verningk’s quick Return, occasioned by this News “ (5), which made him set out from his House, to “ repair to Nimègen, with all speed, confirmed the “ Conjecture of a private Agreement between Hol- “ land and France. This Ambassador appeared to be “ so zealous for the true Interest of his Country, that, “ if any private Negotiation was to be expected, it “ could not be by any other means (6). — He is a “ Man of a quick Wit, who knows what is best, and “ attains to it the shortest way. He is Vigilant and “ Laborious. He has been employed by the States “ in several Embassies, and in all the Treaties, which “ have been made since 1650; but he loves a retired “ Life, and it was with some kind of uneasiness, that “ he left his Country House near Luyen, to go to “ Nimègen (7). — Mr Van Beverningk is a Man “ of no less Ability, than Dispatch (8).”

BEZANITES, or BEZANIANS, an imaginary Sect, which never existed but in the Heads of some Makers of Catalogues of Heretics. There would be reason to wonder, that such absurd Writings, as Those Catalogues are, have not been suppressed in their Birth, by Persons of Authority ; I say, there would be reason to wonder at it, if it were not known, that Those Persons of Authority are very often the least knowing, and the most persuaded of this wrong Maxim, that one may use indifferently Fraud or Force against one’s Enemy ; — dolus an virtus quis in hoste requirat (a) ? These Persons did not perceive, that those Catalogues, being full of impertinent and notorious Falsities, were only proper to inspire the Heretics with a very great Contempt for the Writers of the prevailing Party. They only considered the Advantage, which would accrue from the Heretics being thought to be divided into a thousand Sects. However it be, if Prateolus may be believed (b), there arose a Sect under the Reign of Charles V, and under the Pontificate of Ju- lius III, about the Year 1550 (c), which was called the Bezanites, or the Bezanians, from Theodorus Beza. The only Proof, that he could bring for it, would be, that he had read such a Thing in a Book of Lindanus ; for it is very true, that Lindanus says so (d) ; but without quoting any Body. That which is very certain, is, that one might boldly lay any Wager, though never so great, to be paid to Those, who could prove, that some People, in the XVIth Century, made a separate Sect, in the Quality of Beza's Disciples. The same may be said in relation to a great many other Sects, which fill up the Alphabet of Prateolus. Perhaps the chief Reason, which induced him to mention the pretended Sect of the Bezanites, was the Desire of adorning his Work with the Calumnies, which were published against Beza [A]. If, instead of rewarding Lindanus, they had punished him for his Lies [B], he would not have been transcribed by so many Persons, among whom a Carthusian of Germany is, doubtless, the most ridiculous [C].

[A] Prateolus would not, perhaps, have mentioned the Bezanians, but for the desire of adorning his Work with the Calumnies which were published against Beza. My Conjecture will appear very probable to Those, who shall consider, that, Prateolus having but five or six Lines to bestow upon his pretended Bezanites, has filled seven or eight Pages with the most disgraceful Things, he could find, against That famous Minister, in the Writings of Lindanus, Claudius de Saintes, and John le Viel. Besides, he misrepresents and relates unfaithfully what he takes from them. I am going to give an Example of it. Lindanus had quoted Peter Viretus, who said, that some School-masters took delight in repeating, a thousand times, to their Scholars, that a Man is happy, when he can trample upon the Fear of Death, and infernal Torments. It is a Passage of Virgil. Testatur P. Viretus lib. 2. de Ministr. Verbi esse quosdam ludimagistros ex illo Epicuri grege porcos, qui in scholis soleant suis sepe scholasticis occinere illum vere beatum qui, uti est apud Virgilium,

— metus omnes, & inexorabile fatum

Subjicit pedibus, strepitumque Acherontis avari (1).

(1) Lindanus, Dubitantii, Dial. ii. pag. 246.

Lindanus adds, that Beza had rendered himself suspected of the like Epicureism, as his Brethren of Paris and Orleans witness. What does Prateolus? He maintains, that Lindanus had said, that, when Beza was Schoolmaster, he often repeated This Passage of Virgil to his Scholars (2). Is not This to falsify an Author? Afterwards, Lindanus, who had quoted, hitherto, no Authority against Beza, quotes one Fabricius (3), who accuses That Minister of having sold his Benefices, and of loving the Fair Sex to excess. Beneficia ecclesiastica — publice venderet, & alienas uxores permoleret tam familiariter, ut publicus matronarum haberetur maritus. This is soon said; but where are the Proofs?

(2) Prateolus in Elencho Hæretic. pag. 94.

(3) Michael Fabricius pro Fran. Belduino.

[B] Instead of rewarding Lindanus, they should have punished him for his Lies. It is certain, that Prateolus has ranged a great many Sects in an Alphabetical Order, which never existed, and that he had no other Authority for it, than Lindanus. Father Gaultier, a Jesuit, gives us a List of these same Sects, in his Chronographical Table, on Prateolus's Testimony. If he is not his only Author, he is at least his chief Authority. An hundred Authors have spoken, and do still speak, of these Sects on the Credit of That Jesuit. Observe the prodigious and horrible Propagation of the Fault of a single Writer, I mean Lindanus. When one considers, that This Author, having been preferred to a small Bishopric, was afterwards promoted to a greater, and received great Honours at Rome (4), and that none of all the Superiors, to whom he was to give an account of his Conduct, censured him for the Boldness, with which he had created so many Sects (5); it can be no longer wondered at, that there should be so many Liars, among Those, who engage in Controversies. If Lindanus's Superiors had required him to prove, that certain Disciples of Beza, distinct from Those of Calvin, and from Those of the other Reformers, had formed a great, or small, Body, separate from the other Sectaries; and if, for want of good Proofs, they had condemned him to the Punishment of public Imposts, and declared him unqualified for meddling with holy Things, they had established a Precedent, which would have reclaimed all credulous, or deceitful, Writers, who report so many Falsities. But, instead of bringing him into trouble for it, they looked upon him as a valiant Champion of the Catholic Cause, and raised him more and more. Who would therefore scruple to calumniate Heretics? One might apply these Words of Horace to That Author:

Ulla si Juris tibi pejerati
Poena, Barine, nocuisset unquam;
Dente si nigro fieres, vel uno
Turpius ungue;
Crediderem. Sed tu simul obligasti
Perfidum votis caput, enitefca
Fulchrior multo, juvenumque prodis
Publica cura.
Expediit matris cineres opertos
Fallere, & toto taciturna noctis
Signa cum cœlo, gelidaque divos
Morte carentes (6).

(6) Horat. Od. viii. lib. ii.

*Barine, did Revenge o'retake,
And blast as oft as you deceive;
Were but one Nail, or Tooth, more black,
Thy Vow I would at last believe:
But still more fair, more bright thy Face,
More Crowds of Lovers flock to view,
As each false Oath procured a Grace,
And tempted Thee to prove untrue.
It profits thee to be forsworn
By All that other Mortals fear,
Th' Eternal Gods, thy Mother's Urn,
By whirling Heav'n, and ev'ry Star.*

CREECH.

There is another Reflexion, which would well deserve to be weighed. If the Question had been to defend the Taylors, or some other Tradesmen of an Imperial City, Lindanus, I believe, would not have affirmed any thing publicly, without being certain of the Fact; but, because Religion, and the Glory of God, was concerned in it, he published all that came into his Head, without any Examination, or Remorse. So that, if we consider the matter well, the Zeal of Controversists, instead of increasing their Virtue, raises the Knowledge, and all the Scruples, which might keep them in the way of Probity, in Things purely Human: QUOD NOTANDUM (7).

[C] Lindanus's Lies have been most ridiculously transcribed by a Carthusian of Germany. His Name is Theodorus Petreus — his Catalogus Hæreticorum was printed in the Year 1628. See what Hoornbeek said of it in his Summa Controversi. pag. 321.

(7) See Remark [O], of the Article CAYET.

BEZA (THEODORUS), one of the chief Pillars of the Reformed Church, was of Vezelai, in Burgundy. He was nobly born, both by his Father's and Mother's Side [A], the Twenty fourth of June, 1519. He was hardly weaned, when his

Uncle,

[A] He was born Noble, both on his Father's and Mother's Side. His Father, who was Bailiff of Vezelai, was called Peter de Beza, his Mother's Name was Mary Bourdelot. "P. à Beza ejus oppidi præfeto, & Maria Bourdelotia, utroque Dei gratia " genere nobili (utinam verò potius veri Dei cognitionem imbuto) & integræ famæ parente natus. — " Born of Peter Beza, Bailiff of That Town, and " Mary Bourdelot, both, by God's Grace, of noble " Birth, and unblemished Fame; I wish I could rather " say, instructed in the Knowledge of the True God." Beza, who speaks in this manner, in an Epistle Dedicatoratory

Uncle, Nicolas Beza, Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris, would have him at his House, where he was very affectionately educated, 'till the beginning of December, 1528 (a), when he was sent to Melchior Wolmar, at Orleans, who had a wonderful Skill in instructing Youth. He lodged seven Years at Wolmar's House, who improved him wonderfully in Classical Learning, and instructed him in Religion, out of the Word of God (b); that is, he educated him in the Protestant Religion. Wolmar had been sent for to Bourges, by the Queen of Navarre, to teach the Greek Tongue there. He left That Employment, and returned into Germany, his Country, in the Year 1535. Then Beza was sent to study the Law at Orleans. This Study pleased him but little: He spent the best of his Time in reading good Greek and Latin Authors, and composing Verses. He made such good ones, that he distinguished himself by them, in a particular manner; inasmuch that he was taken notice of and beloved by the most learned Men in the University of Orleans. He took his Licentiate's Degree, there, in the Year 1539 (c), and went to Paris, where some good Preferments were provided for him [B], which combated for some time the Resolution he had taken to return to Wolmar, and make public Profession of the Reformation. The Pleasures of Paris, the Honours, which were offered him, and a great many other Snares of Satan, he says, did not choak the good Seed; he never forsook the Resolution of renouncing Popery, though the Temptations of the World made him Irresolute [C]. He had provided against Those of the Flesh by a Marriage of Conscience (d); that is to say, by a Promise, which he made to a Woman, to marry her publicly, as soon as the Obstacles, which hindered him at That Time, should be removed, and, in the mean time, not to engage himself in the Ecclesiastical State. He faithfully performed These two Promises; but a dangerous Sickness was necessary to extricate him from the Snares, which entangled him in the Mire. The frightful Image of approaching Death made him renew to earnestly the Vow, he had formerly made, to profess the Reformed Religion, that, as soon as he had recovered sufficient Health to travel, he fled to Geneva, with This Woman. He arrived there the Twenty fourth of October, 1548; and, before he resolved upon what Course of Life he should take, he went to see Melchior Wolmar, at Tubingen. The Year following, he accepted the Professorship of the Greek Tongue at Lausanne;

dicatory to Wolmar (1), tells us 'elsewhere, that his Ancestors had been rich for several Generations, and great Benefactors to the Church. "Sum enim ego (ne nescias) Dei gratia, non ex Monachis, non ex adulterio, vel stupro, sed honestis avis & avas prognatus; & ne ad allegorias tuas confugas, scito Bezorum familiam, si forte quæcunque ante ducentos & amplius annos in Monachos superstitione largita est recipere, tam fore locupletem quam ægre hodie sese in sua inopia tueretur (2). — You are to know, that I am not the Offspring of Monks, that I was not begotten in Adultery or Whoredom, but am sprung from honest Parents, and reputable Ancestors; and, that you may not fly to your Allegories, know, that the Family of the Bezæ's, if it could recover what it has superstitiously bestowed on Monks for Two hundred Years, and more, would be as wealthy, as it is now scarce able to support itself in its Poverty."

[B] He went to Paris, where some good Preferments were provided for him.] His Uncle, the Counsellor, had been dead seven Years (3); but another Uncle, Abbot of Froidmont, had no less kindness for This Nephew. He designed to have resigned to him his Abbey, worth Fifteen thousand Livres yearly Rent; which, with two other good Benefices, which Beza was already provided with, and which had been procured him without his Knowledge, would have put him in a very good way. "Huc accedebat quod duobus pinguis & optimis Beneficiis me aliquot macrum adolecentem, & præterea, quod vere testor, istarum rerum proflus ignarum & absentem, onerarent, quorum vestigalia auro coronatos annuos plus minus septingentos æquabant (4)." Besides, his elder Brother was very ill, and could not live long: the Succession to his Benefices was an approaching Hope. He died soon after; and This Death increased Beza's Income considerably. Ex Fratrî morte auctiores mihi redditus essent facti (5). It is easy to judge, that a young Man, so well settled already, and who had such great Talents, many Friends and Relations, and an uncommon Reputation, built on the Success of his Latin Verses, which the Public had seen, might promise to himself all sorts of Preferments. "Quum quæ mihi præter illa impedimenta, quæ antè commemoravi, triplicem laqueum Satanas circumdedit, nempe voluptatum illecebras quæ sunt in ea civitate maximæ; gloriæ dulcedinem, quam "ego non parvam, ex meorum præsertim Epigrammatum editione, ipsius quoque M. Antonii Flaminii doctissimi poetæ, & quidem Itali, judicio eram consequutus; ipsem denique maximorum honorum mihi propositam, ad quos ex ipsis aulicis proceribus aliquot me vocabant, incitabant amici, pater & patruus hortari non desinebant; voluit Deus Opt. Max. ut ----- tandem ex his quoque periculis evaderem (6). ----- And though, besides the Obstacles, already mentioned, Satan laid a triple Snare for me; to wit, the Allurements of Pleasure, which are very great in That City; the Sweetness of Fame, which I had acquired no small Degree of, particularly by the Publication of my Epigrams, and in the Opinion even of the very learned Italian Poet M. Antony Flaminus; lastly, the Hope given me of the greatest Honours, to which some of the Courtiers themselves invited me, my Friends prompted, and my Father and Uncle perpetually exhorted me, to accept of; yet it pleased God ----- to extricate me even out of these Dangers."

(6) Ibid.

[C] The Temptations of the World made him irresolute.] This ought to be no wonder to us. At such an Age, a witty and handsome Man, who wants nothing to divert himself, has much ado to resist Temptation. In vain did the Woman, to whom Beza had promised Marriage, put him in mind of marrying her; the Revenue of the Benefices, which he must have renounced, confused all her Instances: One may easily believe what Beza says upon it. But the Force, with which He, at last, broke these Bonds, is so much the more admirable. "Quum mihi & juveni & a meis otio, pecunia, rebus denique omnibus potius quam consilio, abundanti, Satanas omnia illa impedimenta derepente objecisset, fateor me inani illarum rerum splendore & vanis blanditiis ita fuisse pellectum, ut me totum huc & illuc abripi facile paterer — Uxorem mihi despondi, fed clam, id tamen fateor & uno tantum & altero ex piis amicis consilio, partim ne cæteros offenderem, partim quod adhuc non satis possem à scelerata illa pecunia quam ex sacerdotiis, de quibus ante dixi, perciperiam, ut impurus canis ab uncto coram, abstergeri. — Ego tum interea semper in luto hærerem, instantibus meis ut tandem certum aliquod vitæ genus amplecterer, & patruo mihi omnia deferente, adeo ut quum una ex parte me premeret conscientia, & conjux de promisso appellaret; ex altera vero personatus

[D] After having exercised the Greek Professorship about nine or ten Years at Lausanne, he returned to Geneva.] This is what he says himself, in his Answer to Claudius de Saintes. Novem circiter annos Græcæ literas docuisse (8). Antony la Faye has made use of an even Number, viz. ten Years complete; "Inciderunt postea tempora, quæ Bezam ad migrandum Lausannā, ubi decem annos integros hæserat Græcæ docendi munere defungens, induxerunt (9). — Beza was, afterwards, induced to go to Lausanne, where he taught Greek ten whole Years." Beza, in another Place of his Books, says, that from Lausanne he returned to Geneva, after ten Years stay there. "Inde vero tandem, id est post annum decimum — in hanc urbem iterum tanquam in placidissimum portum rediit (10)." Neither He, nor la Faye, have judged it proper to explain all the Reasons of his leaving Lausanne: What they say of it does not hinder us from suspecting, that there was I know not what in it, which would be fit for secret Memoirs. "Inciderunt Tempora, quæ Bezam ad migrandum Lausannā induxerunt. — Beza was induced to go to Lausanne (11). — Inde — partim quod meipsum cuperem Theologiæ totum consecrare, partim alias ob causas quas nihil hic attinet commemorare — in hanc urbem — rediit (12). — I returned from thence to this City, partly that I might dedicate myself wholly to Divinity, and partly for Reasons, which it signifies nothing to repeat here." His Enemies, who made Mountains of Mole-hills, published, that he had been expelled. That City. See Lindanus, at the Hundred fifty second Page of the second Dialogue of of his Dubitantius; and Baudouin, in his third Answer, fol. 146. verso, where he says, Docuit Lausannæ multis annis — — — illinc rursus atque ignominiose pulsus — — — He taught many Years at Lausanne, from whence he was expelled with Ignominy. This is false; but there was something, I know not, which gave occasion to this Lie. Mr. Tessier misbook one thing for another, when he said, that Beza exercised the Professorship of Philosophy, for ten Years, at Lausanne (13).

One of my Friends (14), a famous Professor at Lausanne, having read what goes before, used all his Endeavours to help me to some Explanations; but his Endeavours proved vain: However, I here give you an Abstract of his Letter, which is of some Moment. "I thought I could have given you some Light into Beza's Life, and particularly as to his leaving This University to go to Geneva. You intimate, that there is something concealed in this matter. I know it has been reported, and even an Author, whose Name I have forgot, says, that it was because he had got his Maid with Child;

But, if it had been so, it would have been known at Geneva, as well as here; and he would not have gone away honourably, Bona cum venia Amplissimi Magistratus Bernensis, as he says in his Letter to his Preceptor Wolmar: And, to conclude, he would not have come every Year, as he did, to Lausanne, and have been so well received. They shewed him so much Respect, that the Council used to go out, and meet him, as our Memoirs testify." I am uncertain whether the Author, meant here, be not Reboul (15), That satirical Writer, who was beheaded at Rome for his Paquinades (16).

[E] He read Lectures, in French, on the New Testament.] He made choice, at first, of the Epistle to the Romans, and afterwards of Those of St Peter. They were, as it were, the Seeds of That great Work, which he published some time after; I mean his Latin Translation of the New Testament with Notes. He revised it several Times, and made many Corrections in it. None but Those, who are ignorant of the Difficulty of such a Work, will think it strange, that he should make some Alterations in each Edition. Illas tamen aliquoties emendatas ab ipso mirabitur nemo, qui operis difficultatem cum dignitate conjunctam, ad decet, perpenderit (17). It is true, This created some Trouble to Those, who had made use of the first Editions; They were always in Fear, that a new one would come out, which would overthrow what they had looked upon as certain; but, to be uneasy at This, is to be angry with Nature, which will have our Knowledge to be very limited, and to increase by Degrees. Cruel Reproaches were made against Beza on this Account. "Nisi quis septies tuas Novi Testamenti editiones emat, neciet quid ajas aut quid neges. Memini typographum eruditum Hieronymum Commelinum hoc mihi ante decennium dixisse, quod crebra mutatione consilii hoc tantum adeptus es ut plurimum nihili faciant Novum Testamentum litera læsum atque sensu flexilorum. Et olim quidam Doctor Cantabrigiensis mihi retulit, quod Cantabrigiæ plures averfati sunt religionem ducti per te ad credendum quod Novum Testamentum depravatum est, sicut per Edwardum Livilejum quod Vetus ulceratum (18). — One must purchase your seven Editions of the New Testament, to know what you affirm or deny. I remember a learned Printer, Jerom Commelinus, told me, ten Years ago, that, by frequently altering your Mind, you had gained This, that many Persons had no Dependence on Your New Testament. And, not long ago, a certain Cambridge Doctor informed me, that many at Cambridge disregarded Religion, being induced, by you, to believe, that the New Testament is corrupt, as they had been, by Edward Livilejus, that the old one is very much so."

Note, that the first Edition of the Work of Beza is of the Year 1566. He published a second, ten Years after, and dedicated it to the Queen of England. The fifth Edition came out in the Year 1598. He dedicated it again to the same Queen, by a new Epistle, and suppressed the first: He should not have suppressed it; for it explains, at large, the Method, and Design, of the Author.

[F] He published several Books during his Abode at Lausanne.] The first was a French Tragi-Comedy, entitled Abram's Sacrifice. Jacomot translated it into Latin, in the Year 1598. Almost at the same time James Brunon translated it into the same Language, at Amsterdam. It has passed through several Impressions. Let us see what Paquier says of it. About the same time, Theodorus Beza lived, a fine Latin and French Poet. He composed, in French Verſe, Abraham's Sacrifice so much to the Life, that, in reading it formerly, it drew Tears from my Eyes (19). Beza went frequently to Geneva, during the Vacations, to visit Calvin, who exhorted him to dedicate his Talents to the Service of the Church, and who advised him, particularly, exercised there, he made a Journey into Germany, with the Character of a Deputy [G]. He had, then, the Pleasure of conferring with Melancthon. Having settled at Geneva, in the Year 1559, he attached himself to Calvin in a particular manner, and, in a little time, was made his Colleague in the Church, and University. He was sent to Nerac, at the Instigation of some Great Persons of the Kingdom, to convert the King of Navarre, and to confer with him about Matters of Consequence (f). This happened when the Guises had invaded the King's Authority, under the Reign of Francis II., to the Prejudice of the Princes of the Blood. The King of Navarre having signified, both by Letters, and by Deputies, that he desired Beza should assist at the Conference of Poissi, the Senate of Geneva readily consented to it. No better Choice could have been made for the Good of the Cause. Beza spoke

I do not mention the other Reasons, which may confute this Doctrine: I dwell only on That of Expediency, alledged by the Writer of Beza's Life. This Expediency is but a Trifle in comparison of the Evil, which the Book of Puniendis Hæreticis produces daily; for, whenever the Protestants complain of the Persecutions, which they suffer, the Right, which Calvin and Beza have acknowledged in the Magistrates, is alledged against Them: Hitherto we have seen no one, who has not come off wretchedly, as to This Objection ad hominem. But let us proceed to other Books, published by Beza, before he left Lausanne. He published a short Explanation of Christianity, ex Doctrina de æterna Dei Prædestinatione; an Answer to Joachim Westphalus, concerning the Lord's Supper; two Dialogues on the same Subject, against Tillemannus Hesbustus (25); (26) The one entitled, Κρησιφαια, the other, "Ὅτις οὐκ ἀποκρίσκει" "postea quædam libere calamo quam rei qua de agebatur majestati conveniebat scripta mutavit, ut & in nonnullis aliis scriptis, è quibus jocos aliquot (ut erat ingenio lepidò & faceto dum ætate adhuc vigente esset) postquam maturior factus est, & Schætzers pœtridas in consilium adhibuisset, e-rahit (26)."

I express myself thus, as a Translator of the Words of Antony la Faye; for, if I would follow the Judgment of some Lutheran Authors, I should be obliged to make use of Terms, which exceed Raillery. Conrad Schlusfeldburgius pretends, that there are such scurrilous and lewd Revilings in Beza's Works, that they become Those only, who have had no other School, than the Stews. What he has said upon This, has been carefully gathered up by the Author of the Calvino-Turcismus. I can only cite Him, not having the Book of That famous Lutheran. "Omif-to finiſh what Marot had begun. Beza followed this Advice, and tranſlated, into French Verſe, the Hundred Pſalms, which remained to be tranſlated. They were printed, with the King's Privilege, in 1561. The Tranſlation of the Remainder of the Pſalms of David ſhows what he could do, though he has not ſo happily ſucceeded as Clement Marot in his fifty (20). After he had recovered from the Plague, he made an Ode to return thanks to God for it. It is pretended, that Jodelle made this Te-traſtick at that Time.

Mais pourquoy fut Beze d'elle aſſailli?

Beza was ſeized with the Plague, when he was re-touching This Immortal Lyre. But why was Beza attacked by It? Beza attacked That General Mortality, The Plague.

A REFLEX-ION on the Book of Puniendis Hæreticis.

(22) Servetus was burnt at Geneva, in 1553.

(23) Fayus, in vita Beza, pag. 15. Note, that by utriuſque beneamus Læ-tius Socinus & Caſſialio.

One of the moſt remarkable Works, published by Beza, during his Abode at Lausanne, was the Treatiſe de Hæreticis à Magiſtratu puniendis. He publiſhed it in anſwer to the Book, which Caſſialio, diſguiſed under the Name of Martinus Bellius, had compoſed on That important Subject, a little after the Execution of Servetus (22). Caſſialio treated the general Theſis of Toleration; Beza maintained, againſt him, that the Magiſtrates ought to puniſh Hæretics, The Author of his Life maintains, that This Work was publiſhed very reaſonably to ſettle fluctuating Minds; Scriptum utriuſque Beza tum reſutavit, tempore in ſpeciem opportuno, ſed re ipſa opportuniſſimo ad cobibendos levium hominum in Religione fluctuantium vagos & incertos æſus (23). It cannot be denied, that the Fear of Capital Punishment is of great Force, towards ſilencing Thoſe, who may have any Doubts to propoſe againſt the prevailing Religion, and to maintain the Unity of External Communion: But it is with the Doctrine, which authoriſes This Practice, as it is with the Invention of Bombs and Carcaſſes, and of all kinds of Machines of War, They, who make uſe of them firſt, draw great Advantages from them, and, whiſt they are the ſtrongeſt, Things go very well with them: But, when they are the weakeſt, They are deſtroyed by their own Inventions. If Beza's Party had been the ſtrongeſt all the World over, and if it could have maintained it's Superiority, the Doctrine, de Puniendis Hæreticis, would have done great Service: It would have reſſeſſed the Zeal, or the ſhuffling Humour, of Innovators; but, becauſe, within a quarter of a League of Geneva, They were expoſed to the Caprices of the ſtrongeſt, and did not know whether God would permit the Seſt of Socinus to prevail, It was very imprudent to maintain, that the Magiſtrates ought to inflict the Punishment of Death on Hæretics: A preſent Advantage ought not to blind our Eyes ſo much, as to hinder us from reflecting on the Conſequences: On ſuch an Occaſion, the Maxim of Regulus is to be made uſe of:

Hoc caverat mens provida Reguli,
Diffentientis Conditionibus
Fœdis, & exemplo trahenti Perniciem veniens in ævum (24).

spoke well; he knew the World; he had a ready Wit, and much Learning. His Speech was heard with attention, till he touched upon the Real Presence. An Expression, which he made use of, caused a murmuring [H]. In the remaining part of this Conference, he behaved like a Man of great Capacity, and never suffered himself to be surprized by the Artifices of the Cardinal of Lorrain. He did not return to Geneva, when the Conference was ended; for, being a Frenchman, Catherine de Medicis would have him stay in his own Country. He preached often at the Queen of Navarre's, at the Prince of Condé's, and in the Suburbs of Paris. After the Massacre at Vassy (g), he was deputed to the King, to complain of That Action.

"folia integra omisit, & loca plurima expunxit quæ erant in editione priori. Quanquam ille bonus & gravis Superintendens, hac qualicunque castigatione non contentus, optat ut non modò isti dialogi in universum, sed simul alia ejus omnia impia & blasphemata scripta, quæ sunt plurima, abolerentur, ne à teneris, piis, & castis hominibus viderentur in æternum. Sic ille (27). --- Omitting others, he proposes Theodore Beza as an Instance; from whose Writings, not only against the Papists, but even the Lutherans, This (he says) may be abundantly demonstrated. And These Things are so true, that the Sacramentarians themselves are tired, and ashamed, of the Follies and Blasphemies, which Beza, without Fear of the Divine Majesty, has given vent to; as Lavaterus himself is forced to acknowledge, and some of the more noble Calvinists have complained to Beza himself. And, though Beza excuses it all, by calling it Pious Raillery; yet This Raillery (says the Patriarch) is more becoming of the Stews, than Divines, brought up in the School of Piety. And, indeed, Beza seems to have gathered the Flowers of his Elegances in the former. Afterwards, as a farther and stronger Proof of This slanderous Character of Beza in his Disputations, and Writings; If any one (says he) is not satisfied of the Truth of This, let him read the two infamous Dialogues of Beza against Hesbustus, which certainly appear to be the Work, not of a Man, but of Beelzebub himself incarnate. I tremble to repeat the obscene and diabolical Blasphemies, which This filthy Slanderer, and Atheistical Writer, has impiously and scurrilously poured forth, in these Dialogues, on the most important Article. Indeed They are so foul, that Beza himself, that he might have the better Colour for suppressing the first Edition, procured a second, in which he omitted seven entire Leaves, and expunged several Passages, which were in the former Edition. Though This good Supervisor, not satisfied with this Correction, wishes, that These Dialogues, as also all his other wicked and blasphemous Writings, which are many in number, were entirely abolished, that they might never more be seen by conscientious, pious, and chaste Men. Thus far He." Remember, that this Conrad is a very passionate Writer.

[G] He made a Journey into Germany, with the Character of a Deputy. This was the Reason of his Journey. An Assembly of Those of the Reformed Religion was detected, at Paris, in the Year 1557. It consisted of Four hundred Persons, whereof seven were burnt, and the rest imprisoned (28). The Churches had Recourse to some Princes of Germany, to endeavour to obtain the Lives of Those poor Prisoners from Henry II. Farel, Beza, and John Budeus, Son of the great William Budeus, were the three Deputies, who went to the Court of the Elector Palatine, to That of the Landgrave of Hesse, and to That of the Duke of Wirtemberg, in the Year 1558. These three Princes earnestly recommended the Cause of Those Prisoners; but the Court of France paid little Regard to These Recommendations. Beza, as he passed through Frankfort, had the Pleasure of speaking with Melancthon (29). This is what Antony la Faye says; but, according to Beza, the Motive to This Journey was, to desire the Intercession of Those Princes for the Vallies of Piedmont, which were, then, in Possession of the King of France, that is, in the Year 1557 (30). He acknowledges, nevertheless, in the Life of Calvin, that That Intercession was desired for the Prisoners at Paris, and that it was not made in vain. "Par-tim intervenientium Germanorum Principum legatione, quam summa celeritate Calvinus procuravit, tempestas illa nonnihil conquievit (31). --- (31) Beza in vita Calvinii.

[H] An Expression, which he made use of at the Conference of Poissy, caused a murmuring.] The Expression was This: "We say, that the Body of JESUS CHRIST is as far from the Bread and Wine, as the highest Heaven is remote from the Earth (32)." Let us see, now, what the Effect of it was; and let us make use of Beza's own Words. "This single Expression (though many others, as contrary and repugnant to the Doctrine of the Church of Rome, had been said by him) was the Cause, that the Prelates began to stir, and to murmur, some saying blasphemavit; others arose to be gone, not being able to do any thing worse, because of the King's Presence: Among others, Cardinal de Tournon, Dean of the Cardinals, who was seated in the chief Place, required of the King, and the Queen, that Silence might be imposed on Beza, or that He, and his whole Company, might be permitted to retire. Neither the King, nor any of Princes, stirred; and audience was given to proceed. Silence being made, Beza said; I desire you, Sirs, to hear the Conclusion, which will satisfy you: And then he returned to his Discourse, which he continued to the end (33)." (33) Ibid.

Catherine de Medicis said, in her Letter to Mr de Rennes, Ambassador of France at the Emperor's Court, "That Beza, speaking of the Sacrament, forgot himself, in a Comparison, so absurd and offensive to the Ears of all the Assistants, that she was near silencing him, and sending all the Ministers away, without suffering them to proceed any farther; but that he obtained from it, least People should go away imbued with his Doctrine, without having heard what should be answered him (34)." Observe the Parenthesis, which the Historian made use of (35). Nothing will better discover the Weakness of Mens Minds. An old Cardinal, and many Bishops are scandalized, are going away, and cry out Blasphemy: for what? Because they heard a Minister say, that JESUS CHRIST is not corporally present in the Symbols of the Bread and Wine of the Eucharist; for it is what That Expression, so offensive to the Ears of all the Assistants, amounts to: Can there be a worse grounded, or more childish, Cause of Offence? When People teach, that the Body of JESUS CHRIST is present but in one Place at one Time, and that it is always seated in Paradise at the Right-Hand of God, They plainly maintain, that it is as remote from the Sacrament of the Eucharist, as Paradise is from the Earth. Now the Prelates of the Conference of Poissy could not be ignorant, that the Ministers teach, that the Humanity of JESUS CHRIST is always in Heaven, at the Right-Hand of God; and that it can be present but in one Place at one Time; and They could not expect, that Beza would not explain the Doctrine of his Party; They should not, therefore, have been offended at This Expression; (for once again, it adds nothing to the Doctrine of the Ministers); or else They went to the Assembly with This Persuasion, that the Ministers would betray their Opinions, and only endeavour to deceive the King. I see but one Thing, which can excuse the Irritation of the Prelates. It may be said, that some Expressions offend us, though they import no more, than some Expressions, at which we are not

The Civil-War followed soon after; during which the Prince of Condé kept him with Him. Beza was at the Battle of Dreux, as a Minister [I]. During the Imprisonment of the Prince, he always kept with Admiral de Coligni, and did not return to Geneva, 'till after the Peace of 1563. He did not see France again 'till 1568, and That was in order to go to Vezelay, where his Presence was necessary [K]. He had written several Books after his Return to Geneva; and he published others after his Return from Vezelay [L]. He returned into France again, in the Year 1571, to assist at the National Synod of Rochel, of which he was elected Moderator. The following Year he assisted at That of Nîmes, and opposed the Faction of John Morel, who designed to introduce a new Discipline. The Prince of Condé sent for him to Straßburg, in the Year 1574, in order to send him to Prince John Casimir, Administrator of the Palatinate; which shews, that it was well known, that he understood other Things, besides Lectures, and Books. The Conference of Mombelliar, offended. For Example, the Parts, which Modesty does not permit to name, may be denoted by modest Words; and yet These Words signify the same thing, as Those, which are called obscene. If the latter are offensive, it is not because of the Thing itself, which They signify, but because we think, that He, who uses them, against Custom, does not pay us That Respect, which Decency requires (36). Upon This Footing, The Bishops of Poissy might be more offended at the Minister's Doctrine, represented by a Comparison, than at the same Doctrine nakedly and plainly represented: But then, their Scandal was not grounded on a Zeal for Religion: For the Comparison, which Beza alledged, is not more contrary to God, or to the Christian Faith, than the plainest Exposition of the Doctrine of the Protestants. It was not, then, for the Interest of God, that they were scandalized; but only because they supposed, that the Minister did not pay sufficient Respect to his Auditors, when he made use of such Expressions. They, who would make such an Apology for These Prelates, would ascribe to them a most criminal Vanity. What shall we say then? Is it better to say, that They acted like Children; that They were not offended at the Things, but at the Words? This would not be for their Honour. I am surprized, that such a grave Historian, as Mezerai, durst say, that This Proposition of Beza was passionate, and offensive; that Beza was ashamed of it himself; and that it strangely offended the Ears of the Catholics; and that the Prelates trembled with Horror at it (37). It is plain, Mezerai thinks These great Tremblings reasonable; and he makes himself ridiculous by it; for it is the same thing, to say, The Body of Jesus Christ is not present in the Holy Sacrament; and to say, It is at an infinite Distance from it.

[J] He was at the Battle of Dreux, as a Minister. I add This Clause, least any of my Readers should suspect, that he assisted there, to fight, and handle the Sword. Claudius de Xaintes reproaches him for it. This is Beza's Answer. "Interfui sane prælio, & inchoanti & desinenti (quidni enim hoc facerem eo rite vocatus?) & quidem quod magis mireris palliatus, non armatus: nec mihi quicquam vere vel cædem cuiusquam vel fugam objecerit (38).
----- I was indeed present at the Battle;
(and why should I not, being properly called?) and, which you will more wonder at, in the Habit of my Order, not armed: nor can any one justly charge me with the Slaughter of one Man, or with Flight.

[K] He went to Vezelay, where his Presence was necessary. Nicolas de Beze, Bailiff of Vezelay, fled to Geneva for Religion, where he died, a little while after, of the Plague, at the House of Theodorus, his Brother by the Father's Side. The latter, having a Mind to order the Affairs of the Family of the deceased, and to endeavour at the same time to save Part of his Estate, took a Journey to Vezelay. Hæc sunt occasio Beze Vezelus suos revivendi, partim ut fratris defuncti liberis proficeret, partim ut nonnullas Patrimonii sui Reliquias dispersas colligeret, quod & fecit quantum locus, tempus, & res permiserunt (39). He endeavoured to persuade a Sister, which he had in a Nunnery, to forsake the Church of Rome. She was an old Nun, very obstinate in her Religion, who would not listen to her Brother's Remonstrances (40).
[L] He had written several Books after his Return to Geneva; and he published others after his Return from Vezelay.] Soon after his Settlement in the Church of Geneva, he drew up a Confession of Faith in Latin, which he had formerly written in French, to justify himself to his Father, and to endeavour The good old Man's Conversion. He published This Confession in Latin, dedicated to his good Master Melchior Wolmar, in the Year 1560. His Pen was quiet, whilst he followed, in the Armies, either the Prince of Condé, or Admiral de Coligni; but, as soon as he returned to Geneva, he wrote two Answers, the one to Castilio (41), and the other to Francis Bandouin. Afterwards, he attacked Brentius, and James Andreas, upon their Doctrine of Ubiquity; and then wrote his Book de Divortiiis & Repudiis, against Bernardin Obbi-nus, who had written in Favour of Polygamy. He attacked also the Errors of Flacius Illyricus. He answered Claudius de Xaintes, Selneccerus, James Andreas, and Pappus, &c. and turned David's Psalms into all sorts of Latin Verses. He published a Treatise of the Sacrament, and a Book against Hyfmannus; some Sermons on the Passion of Jesus Christ, and on the Canticle of Canticles; a Translation of That Canticle into Lyric Verse; and an Answer to Genebrard, to whom That Translation had given new Occasion to repeat his Slanders. In 1590, he published his Treatise de Excommunicatione & Presbyterio, against Thomas Erasmus. Some time after, he examined the Book of Saravia, de Ministorum Evangelii gradibus. I omit the Titles of some other Books; They may be seen in the Lists, which Antony la Faye has placed at the end of his Work, de vita & obitu Theodori Beze, from whence I have borrowed what I have just now said. I have not met with, there, all the Productions of Beza's Pen. The Icones of the Illustrious Persons, who set their Hand to the Work of the Reformation (42), is not mentioned there, nor the Ecclesiastical History of the Reformed Churches. This last Work is very curious; It extends from the Year 1521, to the Peace of the thirteenth of March 1563. I do not wonder, that They have not inserted in This List the ingenious, but too burlesque, Letter of Benedictus Passavantius to the President Lizet (43). La Faye makes no mention of it; but, as for some other satirical or burlesque Pieces, which some attribute to Beza, he maintains, that they are mistaken. "Diſtictis plenis libros composuit, Harangam ad Cardinalem Lotharingum, de furoribus Gallicis, vitam Catharinæ Medicæ, & similis notæ chartas. Atqui tam verum est libros illos fuisse compositos & Beza, quàm verum est (quod isti ignoranter & temerè deblaterant) ab Amiralii ministro scriptum fuisse librum, cui nomen est Matagonis de Matagonibus (44). — He wrote Books, full of satirical or evil-sweet, The Speech to the Cardinal of Lorraine, concerning the Madnys of the French Nation, The Life of Catharine of Medicis, and the like. And it is as true, that these Pieces were written by Beza, as it is true (which these Persons ignorantly and rashly blab out) that the Book, entitled Matagonis de Matagonibus, was written by The Admiral's Minister."

Garasse maintains, that Beza, "gives himself, jestingly, the Name of FRANTOPIN, in writing against Dr de Xaintes, in That little Macaronic Book, which begins with These Words: Tu facis bene de sufficiente, Domine Magister noster, post habere bibi-tum quatuor bonas fides de vestro vino Sorbonnico, in dejunando Theologaliter, &c (45)." He attributes also a Book to him, entitled, A Parallel of Henry II with Pilate (46). Observe, that there is a great Fault in the List of Antony la Faye: It does not mention the Date of the first Editions, nor when, and how many times, the Books of Beza were reprinted.

in 1586, engaged him against James Andreas, a Divine of Tubingen. Beza would have had the Dispute managed syllogistically; but he was obliged to yield to the Desires of his Adversary, who would not be confined to the Rules of Syllogisms. The Success of This Dispute was as usual [M]; each Party boasted to have gained the Victory, and published an Account accordingly. Beza lost his Wife, in the Year 1588; but this Domestic Affliction, great as it was, did not hinder him from going to the Synod, which Thofe of Bern had assembled. The Doctrine of Samuel Huberus, concerning our Justification before God, which, he said, consisted in an inherent Quality (b), was there condemned. Beza married again, the same Year, to a Widow, who survived him [N]. The Inconveniencies of old Age began to come upon him, in the Year 1597, and obliged him to speak but seldom in public; and, at last, he desisted altogether from it, in the beginning of the Year 1600. His poetical Vein was not so dried up, in the Year 1597, but that he wrote some Verses, full of Fire, against the Jesuits, occasioned by the Report, which was spread of his Death

[M] The Success of the Dispute of Mombeliard was as usual. Antony la Faye asserts this: "Utrunque placide discessum est sine lite, aut amarulentia; sed nullo fructu, ut fere semper in talibus palæstris publicis contingere solet (47). — Both Parties retreated peaceably, without Strife, or Bitterness; but with no Advantage gained on either side, as is usual in such Kind of Public Disputes." Some Gentlemen, who had left France for their Religion, and had fled to Mombeliard, gave occasion to This Dispute. The Count of Mombeliard desired the Canton of Berne to name Deputies, to confer with the Divines of Wirttemberg; he desired also the Republic of Geneva to send Beza to the Conference; This he did in compliance with the Desire of the Refugees. Abraham Musculus, Minister of Bern, and Peter Huberus, Professor of the Greek Language in the same City, were the Swiss Deputies: Beza, and Antony la Faye, were the Deputies of Geneva. James Andreas, and Luke Ofsander, were the chief Deputies of Wirttemberg. Most of them heard only Beza and James Andreas, and saw but little Light in This Dispute of several Days, because it was not managed Syllogistically; for, when two Persons answer each other, by long Discourses, it is almost impossible to perceive, whether they remove the Difficulties. "Jacobus Andreas perpetua & declamatoria oratione utebatur. Quare illius vestigiis insisteret Beza coactus est. Unde non tam facilis, expedita, aut perspicua fuit tota illa dierum aliquot disceptatio (48). — James Andreas used a long and declamatory Way of Speaking. Beza was, therefore, obliged to do the same. Hence it was, that This Dispute, which lasted so many Days, was not at all cleared up." A Man is scarce ever worried upon these occasions, if he knows but how to prattle. The Parties agreed not to publish the Relation of This Conference; but, when it was known, that Letters were dispersed all over Germany, which were read in the Courts of Princes, and in private Conversations, and that These Letters proclaimed the Victory of James Andreas, and that, at last, the Divines of Wirttemberg had published the Conference with Marginal Notes; Beza was obliged to publish a Counter-Relation.

I have lately read, in a Work of Abraham Scultetus, that The Political Reasons, as well on the Part of the French Refugees, as on that of the Count of Mombeliard, contributed much more to the appointing this Conference, than the Theological Reasons. The Refugees sent for Beza, because they thought, that, if he conferred amicably with Dr Andreas, about the Controverted Matters, They should live more easy in the County of Mombeliard, and that, perhaps, the Duke of Wirttemberg might come over to their Side. As for the Count, he had been a Urgonist in his Youth; but, having heard Beza's Sermons and Lectures, he declared freely, that he had seen many things at Geneva, and in Switzerland, of which James Andreas had never spoken a word to him, and that he had scarce seen any thing there, of what the same Doctor had often told him. Geneva, & in Helvetia, vidi multa, de quibus nihil, pauca eorum, de quibus sepe audivi ex D. Jacobo (49). This was to declare, that That Person had not drawn the Picture of the Calvinists very faithfully. From that time, the Count was more kind to the Reformed, and afforded a Retreat to Thofe, who fled from France for their Religion. But, when it was represented to him, that the Duke of Wirttemberg had no Son, and that the House of Austria would not suffer a Favourer of the Huguenots to inherit That Duke's Succession; I say, when it was represented to him, that he had made himself suspected, both by his Journey to Geneva, and by his Kindness to the French Refugees, he consented to the Dispute between Dr Andreas and Beza; but his Aim was not so much to promote the Truth, as to clear himself from the Suspicion of Calvinism. Non tam ut veritati consulere, quam ut se de Calvinismo purgaret (50). This is what Daniel Tossan replied to Christopher Pezelius, who had asked him the Reason of the Conference of Mombeliard. Scultetus, who relates it (51), was at Dinner, where This was said (52). If we had a Collection of such like Table-talk, as large as That, which is found in Plutarch's Works, we might learn a great many curious Things from it.

[N] He married again, the same Year, to a Widow, who survived him.] The Name of his first Wife was Claudine Denoff: See below the Remark [Y]. Their Marriage continued forty Years: The Name of his second Wife was Catherine de la Plane, who took great Care of him as long as he lived. Catharina Plania, Affensis, Francisca Taruffi Januensis Vidua, quæ ei usque ad ultimum Spiritum magno subsidio fuit (53). Patin is mistaken, when he says, that Stephen Pasquier wrote some Verses on the three Marriages of Beza.

Uxores ego tres vario sum tempore nactus,

Cum juvenis, tum vir, factus & inde senex.

Propter opus prima est validis mihi juncta bus annis,

Altera propter opes, tertia propter opem (54).

The Meaning of These Verses is; I married three Wives, at several times; in my Youth, in my Manhood, and in my Old-Age. I married the first Wife for the Delights of Love; the second, because she was Rich; the third, that she might nurse me in my Infirmities. But This could not agree with Beza, since he had not had three Wives. Some say, that Pasquier made these Verses on himself (55). He, who observes This, is, nevertheless, in the Error of Gay Patin concerning Beza's three Wives. He married again, for the third time, at seventy Years of Age, and had sent word of it to his intimate Friend Junius, a Dutisman (56), in these Words: If it be a Folly to marry again at seventy Years of Age, I have lately committed it. He was an old Cock, which could not break off from Venus's Cbariot, to which he had been barnassed from his Youth (57). These are the Words of a credulous Monk, who is but seldom well-informed of what he says. If He, and Patin, had consulted the nineteenth Book of Stephen Pasquier's Letters, They would have spoken with more exactness. Pasquier relates, that, having heard it said, that Theodora Beza was married again, he wrote This Tetragitch in Favour of the Person, who should marry three Wives (58).

Beza's second Wife was wonderfully careful of him; He left her Heiress of all his Estate in Geneva. "Eorum quæ Genevæ habebat hæredem ex æsse instituit Catharinam Planiam conjugem suam; quia senectutem pñus sustentante, & gloriam ex officiis assiduam erga ipsum, annorum septendecim spatio, quærente, vivebat (59). — He left Catharine de la Plane, his Wife, who supported his old Age, and placed all her Glory in taking the greatest Care of him, for seventeen Years, sole Heiress of his Estate at Geneva." Beza never had any Children (60).

Death, and that, before he expired, he had made Profession of the Romish Faith [O]. The last Verses, which he composed, were a Votiva Gratulatio, to Henry IV, after he had been kindly received by him, near Geneva, in the Month of December, 1600 (i) [P]. He lived 'till the thirteenth of October, 1605, and preserved his Good Sense to the last [Q], and expressed great Sentiments of Piety with his last Breath. Was [O] He wrote Verses — on occasion of the Report that was spread of his Death — and that he had made Profession of the Romish Faith.] They, who invented, and spread, this Story, were but little acquainted with the True Interest of Their Church. These kind of Frauds may be spread, to some advantage, against a Sect, which has neither Authors, nor Printers; but They must needs be prejudicial, when they are boldly employed against a Church, which has a thousand Presses, and Pens, in her Bosom, which let nothing fall to the Ground, and take the Ball at the first rebound. Was it not great Folly to imagine, that the Protestants would lose such a fair Opportunity of exclaiming against Monkish Impostures and Cheats, and to draw many thundering Conclusions from their Assurance in reporting a Falshood, which was so easy to be confuted? The Ministers of Geneva were not silent on This Occasion. They published two Pieces, attended with all the Authenticity necessary to refute This foolish Lie: One of These Pieces was in Latin, and the other in French. Editio nomine suo publicis duabus scriptis, altero Latine (cui Beza redidit nomen fecerunt) altero Gallice (61). Beza, in a Letter to William Stuckius, confuted the same Story (62); and the Jesuit Clement du Puy, who was looked upon as the Inventor of This Fable, drew a shower of satirical Verses on himself in particular, and on his own Order in general, which Beza's Muses, old as they were, made very formidable (63). It was easy to force This: so that They were but slighted Persons, as to their own Interests, who invented such a Romance. There are rash Persons in all Communions. See the Article BELLARMIN, Remark [E].

I must not omit, that the Jesuits asserted, that this Story was invented by the Protestants, to be imputed to them. See the Scaligerana, under the Word Velserus, and the Notes on the Book, entitled, La Confession de Sanci, wherein you will find an Abstract of the Letter, which they published, in 1593, under the Name of a Savoyard Gentleman, in which they maintained, that The pretended Letter, which was attributed to Them, about the Death, and Conversion, of Theodorus Beza, was a mere Imposture of Beza himself, and the Bezzans at Geneva. The Author of the Notes observes, that Stephen Pasquier had no regard to This, and that the Jesuit Ribcrome gave out, as certain, the Story of This Minister's Conversion, in a Book, reprinted in the Year 1599 (64).

Observe, that, in 1591, there was a Report, that Beza was dead. This false News was written by a Minister to Mr du Plestis Mornai, who answered him in these Terms: Tu have made me sorrowful by the Death of Beza, quam nondum certo accepi, quam jam olim animo præcepi. We have lost three or four Stars; I see nothing but thick Clouds over us. This we find in the Ninty fourth, and Ninty fifth Pages of the second Volume of his Memoirs.

[P] He was kindly received — by Henry IV.] Dr Spon reports the Speech, which Beza made to That Prince, and the King's Answer (65). Mr de Perseux thought, falsely, that Henry IV entered into Geneva, and that he was harangued there by This Minister (66). He received the Deputies of Geneva at Lully (67), a Quarter of a League from St Catherine's Fort, which Fort was two Leagues from Geneva. Thuanus says, that the King made Beza a Present of Five hundred Crowns (68).

[Q] He was sensible to the last.] His Historian makes no mention of what Thuanus observes concerning This Venerable Old Man's Memory. "Præsentium memoriam debilitata quippe mente evanidam amiserat, præteritorum dum ingenio valebat impressam ferverat. Itaque et totos Psalmos Hebraice, et quodcumque caput ex B. Pauli Epistolis proposuisset, integrum Græce recitabat, nec in iis quæ olim dicerat judicio carebat, sed quæ dixerat statim obliviscatur (69)." The Meaning of this is, that, in divers Respects, Beza's Memory was very good, and very bad; very good, as to Things which he had learned during the Vigor of his Mind; (for he could repeat all the Psalms in Hebrew, and all St Paul's Epistles in Greek, by heart), and very bad, as to Things present; for, a little after having said any thing, he forgot, that he had said it. He continued in This Condition almost two Years, if we may believe Thuanus, who seems to have been furnished with very good Memoirs on this Head. And, indeed, Casaubon affirms, that, in Point of Erudition, Beza shewed himself, in the latter Years of his Life, such as he had appeared Twenty Years before. He discoursed so clearly upon ancient History, that one would have thought he had just been reading Plutarch, and the like Authors. He spoke Latin, and sometimes Greek, as before: But, after having amply discoursed on the Subject of the new King of England, he would, often, ask, in the same Conversation, Whether it was true, that Queen Elizabeth was dead? "Venerandus senex Theodorus Beza cum per longinquitatem ætatis factus sit obliviosus, adeo ut post frequentes de novo Regis Angliæ sermones subinde me rogaret de Regina, an verum esset quod fama jactaret, illam satis concessisse. Idem tamen in literis visus nobis esse quem ante annos viginti noveramus. Loquitur Latine, interdum & Græce, ut antea: audivimus de historia veteri differentem & re nata luculentissime, ut videtur recens esse à lectione Plutarchi & id genus auctorum (70)." Thuanus was misinformed of the Circumstances of Beza's Death; He says, that This Minister, as he was going out to Church, was seized with a sudden Convulsion, of which he died. The Truth is, that, for some Weeks, his Strength declined visibly, and that there was nothing sudden, or unexpected, in his Death. See la Faye, pag. 65, 66.

[R] He did his Party great Services.] Leti relates, that Sixtus V. caused two Conferences to be held, at which he was present, to deliberate about the means of depriving the Protestant Party of the great Support they had in the Person of Theodorus Beza (71). What could be said more to the Honour of This Minister, than the representing him as a Man, who made the Pope, and Cardinals, uneasy, as to Affairs of State; for there was no Controversy in the Case? Leti pretends, that, in the Year 1587, the Deputy of the King of Navarre, to the Cantons, made use of Beza's good Offices, to obtain some Levies in their Country; That Beza went from Town to Town, over all the Protestant Cantons, and that he animated the Swiss in such a manner, that they furnished Prince Casimir with great Sums; that the Catholic Cantons, seeing this, informed the Court of Rome of the great Prejudice this Person did to the Catholic Cause; that, upon This, Sixtus V. caused two Conferences to be held, the Result whereof was, that all manner of means should be employed, to oblige this Minister to leave Geneva; after which, nothing would be more easy than the Conversion of That City; and that the Conversion of Geneva would be the total Ruin of Herey, both in Switzerland, and France; that Mr de Sales, Bishop of Geneva, being at That Time at Rome, was desired to declare, in the Pope's Presence, by what means he thought they might dislodge This old Minister from his Post; that he declared, the only means was, to supply the Duke of Savoy with necessary Forces for the Conquest of Geneva; that Beza, not doubting, that there was a Design upon his Life, would take such care of himself, that they must not expect any enterprize against his Person would succeed; that, after This Discourse of Mr de Sales, the Design was laid aside of getting rid of This Minister by Assassination, or by Poison; forasmuch as they were informed, that his Highness of Savoy had tried all Expedients for This Purpose in vain.

I have three things to observe upon this Narrative. I. Antony la Faye does not say, that Beza made was exposed to a great Number of Slanders and Calumnies: But he made both Catholics, and Lutherans, see, that he knew how to defend himself, and that he had both Teeth and Claws. He had a great share in Scaliger's Esteem [S]. I criticize Moreri only in five Things [T]. Mezerai treats This Minister very ill; he adopts the Story for Truth, which had been spread, of an Accusation of Sodomy, entered against Beza, before the Parliament of Paris; and another Story of his running away with Candida, a Taylor's Wife. This appears unworthy of a judicious Historian [U].

BEZA, is it said, was the Subject of some Consultations at Rome.

The

a Journey to Switzerland, in the Year 1587; and yet he seldom forgets these sort of things. An Expedition like This, the Effects of which were, it is said, so great, and of such general Influence for the Good of the Cause, could not have been unknown to, or suppressed by, him. II. Francis de Sales was not Bishop of Geneva, under Sixtus V.: Clement VIII made him Coadjutor of That Bishopric. III. The Discourse, which is ascribed here to This Prelate, does not agree with These Words of Moreri: Beza, with whom Francis de Sales had some Conferences at Geneva, confessed to him, that the Catholic Religion was the only true Religion (72). Upon such a Confession, the Prelate would have advised The Pope to offer all manner of Dignities to This Minister. The Description of the Care, which it was said, at Rome, that Beza took of his Life, is hyperbolic. "Non faceva passo, senza un cumulo grande di precautioni, e senza pigliar cento & mille misure, non costumando di praticar nissuno, senza esser sicuro d'un inveterata conoscenza, ne voleva domesticci in sua Casa, della di cui fede non ne fosse sicuro altro che quei suo perversi Settarii lo custodivano come suoi Demoni tutelari, nè usciva mai di Casa senza haverne cinque o sei à lato, e quel che importa, che per maggior sicurezza non metteva mai li piedi fuori della Citta (73)." The Meaning of This is; "that he never stirred without the utmost Precaution; that he conversed with none but his most intimate Acquaintance; that his very Domesticcs were only Those of his Sect; that he never went abroad without five or six of them about him; and that, for the greater Security, he never set foot out of the City." But it is true, that he made use of Precaution. See one of his Pieces against Claudius de Xaintes. You will find, there, that They upbraided him with not daring to go out of Geneva, for fear of being killed, like another Cain, by the first, who should meet him. Geneva pedem non aude effere, ne te quisquis invenerit ut alterum Cain occidat. He answered, that, if God called him to it, he would go any where without Fear; though he was not ignorant of the Ambushes, which were laid for him, and which he would avoid as prudently as he could. "Esti mihi appositus à tuis illis & veneficis & sicarios non ignoro (hæ sunt enim artes Romanæ) quorum etiam unus jam hic deprehensus pœnas dedit . . . Interea me sane libens domi contineo, & vestras infidias quam prudentissimè possum evito (74)."

(76) I write this in May, 1699.

[8] He had a great Share in Scaliger's Esteem. This appears by his Epicidium on Beza's Death. He inserted an ill Prefage in it, which proved false. Addito etiam de fato urbis in qua decessit omine, quod tamen hactenus eventu caruit (75). It is ninety Years, more or less, since Thuanus made This Observation, and it has not hitherto (76) appeared, that Scaliger's Prefage has been confirmed in the least. It was not one of Those Poetical Predictions, which are of no greater Consequence, than Those of a Fatal Commentator on St John's Revelation. Nor do I believe, that the Desire of comparing Beza to St Augustin, which might have engaged an hundred other Poets to hazard This Prediction, made Scaliger speak in This manner. It is very probable, that, considering the State of Things, He feared for the City of Geneva the Fate of That of Hippo, which was taken by the Vandals, a little after the Death of it's Bishop. So that it was rather a Political Conjecture, than a Poetical Rapture. The Event has proved it to be so; which shews, that the surest way is not to judge at all of Things to come. Scaliger's ill Prefage is This;

Utque Dei famulo non Hippo superlute capta est,
Cum quateret Lybicas Vandalus Hostis opes,
Indulsi tibi sic præsentia numinis, isto
Cernere ne posses ulteriora malo.

Atque utinam celeres rapiant procul omina venti,
Et potius mendax finxerit ista metus.
Sed te felicem, &c.

And, as, secure 'till holy Austin died,
Hippo, untaken, stem'd the Vandal Tide;
So Heav'n withhold, in Kindness, from Thy Eyes Approaching Ills, and greater Miseries.
Far may the Winds the luckless Omen bear:
May it be nothing but the Child of Fears
Yet Happy Thou, &c.

There are certain Things in the Scaligerana, to the Disadvantage of Beza; but do we cease to esteem a Man, when, for Example, we make no Difficulty to confess, that the many Affairs, he was concerned in, and the Multitude of Books, he composed, hindered him from acquiring much Learning?

[T] I criticize Moreri only in five Things. I. Beza was not yet past Childhood, when he was brought to Paris: His Mother carried him thither, as soon as he was weaned. Mater — mariti imperio obsecuta Lutetiam usque me RECENS ABLACTATUM perduxit. Beza writes This to Wolmar. II. We shall see below (77), whether we ought to believe, that a scandalous Epigram drew the Repentment of Justice on Beza — and that he was accused of a more horrible Crime, than Fornication, and that his Debaucheries brought a Disease upon him. III. It is not true, that Calvin often procured important Commissions for Beza, that he might assist at some Conferences against the Lutherans. I do not think there were any Conferences, during Calvin's Life, at which Beza was present; for the Dispute of the Year 1557 must not be reckoned; Chance brought it about (78): It was but a trifling Business; They went into Germany upon another Design. IV. It is not true, that Beza is the Author of the Confession of Faith of the Reformed Churches. The Confession of Faith, which he composed first in French, and afterwards in Latin, is a different Piece from the Confession of the Churches. V. Beza did not preside in the Synod of Nîmes, in the Year 1572. The following Faults are to be imputed to Moreri's Printers: They have placed Beza's Birth in the Year 1619, instead of 1519. They have quoted Antony Pale De vita & obitu Theod. Beze: It should be Antony la Faye, and Beza.

(77) In Remark [U].

(78) Beza, Apol. ad Cl. de Xaintes, pag. 295.

[U] What Mezerai says, appears unworthy of a judicious Historian. If he had been contented to say, that we read, in many printed Pieces, that Beza was accused of This abominable Crime, it would be no strange Thing; for he would have said nothing but what is very true. Perhaps Two hundred Authors might be quoted, who, transcribing one another, have spoken of This Process. Mezerai goes much farther; He maintains the Thing? he warrants it; and can produce no Proof for it; This may be called the Conduct of a rash Historian. Let us set down his Words. "He may, without prejudice to any Religion, very well be called a very wicked Man, and a Soul wholly corrupted; who, like a filthy Harpy, spoiled the most Holy Things with his malicious Raileries; and whose Heart brooded nothing but bloody, and altogether execrable, Designs. Neither was there any manner of Villany, wherewith he did not defile his Youth; the Poems, whereof he designed to cover the Lewdness with the Title of Juvenilia, make sufficient mention of it: But, besides, it is certain, that he fled to Geneva, to avoid the Punishment, he deserved, for the Sodomy, whereof he was accused before the Parliament of Paris; and that he carried his Candida away with him, who was a Taylor's Wife, and who was yet living in the beginning of This Century, after he had sold certain Benefices, which he had of his Uncle, and, among others, the Priory MEZERAI criticized.

The Poems, entituled Juvenilia, have raised great Clamours [X]. It cannot be denied, that they contained Verses too licentious, and little becoming the Chastity of Christian Muses; but, if the Author's Enemies had been reasonable, they would rather have praised him for the Grief he expressed for them (k), than have pun

"of Longjumeau: beginning, in this manner, the Reformation of his Life, with Simony and Adultery (79)." Mr Maimbourg gives only a Paraphrase of These Words of Mezerai, when he drew an horrible Picture of Beza (80); but, instead of following the Example of Mezerai, who quotes no body, he quotes Bolice, Spondanus, Florimond de Remond, Claudius de Xaintes, &c. Had he had better Witnesses, he would, doubtless, have produced them; so that it is unquestionable, that Mezerai had no other Authorities, than Those, which Maimbourg quotes. Once again, This is most shameful in so famous and illustrious an Historiographer. Truly, an Historian would write very pretty Stories, should he mention all the abusive Language, which Controversialists give each other, of what Religion soever they be. They are not to be believed in personal Facts, with which they reproach their Adversaries, unless they support them with authentic Acts; so that Mezerai, having only followed Claudius de Xaintes, and Florimond de Remond, who brought no Proofs for Their Slanders, has injured himself greatly with Persons of judgment.

THE WAY to know whether an Accusation be false.

Suffer me to make an Observation here, which may be of use in the Discussion of personal Facts. Several Authors have maintained, I. That Beza left France, to avoid the Consequences of a Process of Sodomy, which, they say, was entered against him, in the Parliament of Paris. II. That he carried a certain Taylor's Wife away with him. Beza has publicly maintained, that they were two enormous Calumnies; that he had lived an unblameable Life at Paris; and that he left it, neither out of Fear, nor for Debt, but for his Religion; and that he had never attempted his Neighbour's Wife, any more than the Kingdom of the Indies. Lutetia inculpatæ & bona integraq; existimatione — vivisse. Inde non fuga, non clam, non vi, non metu, non are alieno oppressum (quæ tu mihi falsissime & mendacissime impingis) sed unius religionis studio — ad veram Ecclesiam iustis itineribus ultro concessisse. — Coram Deo juratus testari possum non magis unquam mihi contigisse ut cujusquam uxoris pudicitiam attentarem, quam ut Indorum regnum invaderem (81). Thus far, no Man of any Religion whatsoever is obliged to believe, that Beza was either innocent, or guilty; no one is obliged to believe, either that his Minister would not deny an infamous Crime, if he was not innocent of it; or that his Priest would advance a heinous Accusation, if it were not true. The Reader, therefore, must suspend his Judgment, till the Accusation be proved: But, on the other side, he must give it for the accused Person, when he sees, that the Accusation remains without Proof, and chiefly in the Circumstances, which I am going to mention. If the Fact in question be of such a nature, that it may be proved authentically; and, if the Accusers want neither Good-will, nor Industry, it must be concluded, that, if they do not prove it, They are Calumniators. This is sufficient to convict Beza's Accusers of Calumny. A Process, entered against a Prior of Longjumeau, before the Parliament of Paris, is a Thing, which may be easily verified. The Accusers, Their Attorney, Their Petition, The Commission of Information, The Verbal Process of the Commissioners, are settled Persons, or Pieces, which are preserved by public Authority; and it can never be thought, that a wretched Fellow, who flies away as fast as he can, has Credit enough to abolish the Proceedings, and to silence the Complaints of the Party against him. The Taylor, whose Wife was said to have been debauched, lived as long as the pretended Seducer; so that it was easy for him to bring his legal Deposition. How comes it then, that such a one as Claudius de Xaintes, and so many Ecclesiastics, who publicly accused Beza, could never produce any Vouchers, nor a formal Deposition of This Taylor? Perhaps Beza's obliging Language disarmed them: On the contrary, he treated Them like Dogs; his Jest, and his ill Language, pierced them through and through; and all their Writings breathe the most violent Hatred. So that They had, on the one side, all imaginable means of coming at Proofs; and, on the other, a most passionate Desire of finding Them; and yet they have not produced Them. From whence any equitable Person ought to conclude, that They are meer Calumniators.

This is the Sublance of my whole Argument. The Thing is of such a Nature, that, if it were true, legal, and authentic, Proofs would not be wanting. The Accusers have all the Skill, and all the Address, necessary for finding these Proofs: They have the greatest Interest in the World in finding Them: They have not found them: It must, therefore, be concluded, that it is, because there were none. There were none; it must, then, be again concluded, that the Thing in question was false and chimerical.

I have enlarged on This Thought, because it may serve to clear up the Uncertainties, occasioned by so many rash Writers, who transcribe the most heinous Accusations from one another, without attempting to prove them; whilst, on the other Hand, the Accused, and their Friends, do not cease to cry out against the Calumny.

[X] The Poems, entituled Juvenilia, raised great Clamours.] They were printed at Paris, in the Year 1548, in the Printing-House of Jodocus Badius Ascensius, by Conrad Badius, for himself, and Robert Stephens, with a Licence of the Parliament for Three Years. The Author's Effigies is in the second Page; wherein he is said to have been, then, Twenty nine Years of Age. He dedicated This Work to his Professor Melchior Wolmar. These Poems consist of Silvæ, Elegies, Epitaphs, Pictures, Icones, and Epigrams. It is in vain to tell the Controversialists, that Beza produced these lewd Poems before he was a Protestant; for he himself contradicts Those, who make such an Apology for him. He acknowledges, that, from sixteen Years of Age, he had imbibed the Knowledge of the pure Gospel; and that, when he abjured Popery outwardly, he had long before made a Vow of that Abjuration (82). The first thing he returns God thanks for, in his Testament, is, quod anno ætatis suæ 16 veræ Christianæ Religionis cognitione ac luce donatus sit (83). Note, that Morton, having confessed, in the first Edition of his Catholic Apology, that Beza, while he was a Papist, was such as he is represented; erat, erat, sed dum in volutabro vestro miser hæserat — dum Papista birrus fuit, &c (84), has corrected This in the second Edition, and maintained that Beza always had the Character of an honest Man. Berleius took the Advantage of the first Edition (85). It is in vain, likewise, to have recourse to Recrimination; for neither Muretus, nor John della Casa, nor an hundred other Poets, who had no Reformation, nor any new Church to set up, were obliged to distinguish themselves by a singular Virtue and Piety. The shortest way is, to place These Poems of Beza among the Sins of his Youth, for which he asked Pardon both of God and the Public (86). It is certain, that he endeavoured to suppress them (87), as much as his Enemies endeavoured to revive them; and, if he consented, at the Age of Seventy eight Years, to a new Edition of his Latin Verses, he did not design Those should be inserted, which gave offence. I wonder the contrary was believed (88); for not only the Authors, who are quoted, do not say, that Beza gave ALL his Verses, to be printed with the fairest Characters, that were to be found at the Stephens's; but it is certain also, that the Edition, which then was made, does not contain the licentious Verses of the Juvenilia. Consider well These Words of la Faye. "Accidit ut de Beza poematis ageretur, & generos. D. Zafirzelli pateret à Beza sibi donari illa carmina, quæ cum ipse, tum Paludius, vita digna judicaret. Id quum imperfasset, Beza concedente, curavit ille in unum colligi Sylvas, Elegias, Epitaphia, Epigrammata, Icones, Emblemata, Catonem Censorium, & ut elegantissimis typographi Stephaniani formis excuderetur effectit anno 1597 (89). — The Discourse happened to turn upon Beza's Poems; and D. Zafirzelli desired Beza to give him those Pieces, which both He, and Paludius (he was Zafirzelli's Tutor) should think worthy of being preserved. After having committed the Fault of publishing his Juvenilia, I think there was no other way left for him to avoid suffering for it, but to live a very obscure Life, or very remote from Theological Disputes; for, under what Figure soever he had appeared, his Enemies would have taken Advantage of This Blot, to lessen his Reputation. He had This chiefly to fear in whatever Party he should signalize himself in point of Controversy. And it is not to be questioned, but that, if the same Arms, he made use of against the Papists, had been employed, by him, against the Protestants,

You will find a good Justification of Beza in the Critical Miscellanies of Mr Ancillon (91): He relates a fine Passage of Mr Dailly (92), whereby we learn, that the Infidels reproached the Primitive Church, that they gave their best Employments to Those, whom the Scandal of their Ill Lives had rendered odious and infamous among the Pagans. Mr Ancillon refers us to his Apology for Calvin, Luther, Zuinglius, and Beza (93).

[X] An ill Construction was put upon the Epigram on Candida and Audebert.] There is nothing so ill grounded, as the enormous Accusation built on This Epigram. See the Article AUDEBERT. They who pretend, that the Candida of Beza was his Wife, are mistaken; for Beza's Wife was never with Child; and there are some Verses on Candida's Pregnancy in the Juvenilia of This Author. Quanam illa fuit Candida? uxor mea sibi, quam in meis versificulis prægnantem superis commendo, quum uxor mea nunquam etiam conceperis (94). I have not been able to discover any Thing concerning Beza's Wife, except that she was of no high Birth; and that their Correspondence began four Years before they left the Kingdom, and before they married in the Face of the Church. Her Husband gives a good Character of her. "Uxorem mihi ea quam illa tempora ferebant ratione — quatuor circiter annos ante voluntarium meum exilium despondi, genere equidem imparem, sed ea virtute præditum mulierem cujus me penitere ab eo tempore minime oportuerit (95). Scaliger says, that she was the Daughter of an Advocate, and barren; and afterwards cries out, What a foolish Woman (96)! The Historian of the Husband speaks otherwise of Her; He praises her for several good Qualities, and chiefly for her conjugal Affection; but it is the common Style of Those, who write the Life of a Learned Person; His Wife, if ever he had any, is always a Woman of great Merit, and of a peaceable Temper. The Funeral Orations of Professors never omit This Topic, though The Makers of them have but too often a Socrates to praise. However it be, let us see the Elogy of Beza's first Wife.

Anno 1588. mense Aprilis e vivis excessit Claudia "Denossa Bezae conjux, cum qua conjunctissime & honestissime vixerat annos quadraginta. Fuit illi casus hic gravissimus: erat enim femina multum laudata, sedula, frugi, & viri sui in primis studio-fa (97). — In the Month of April, 1588, died Claudia Denossa, the Wife of Beza, with whom he lived forty Years lovingly and honourably. This was a very great Misfortune to him; for she was a Lady of great Merit, Diligent, Thrifty, and particularly careful of her Husband." Not a word of her Family: This makes me question, what Scaliger says, that she was the Daughter of an Advocate: And besides, would Beza have confessed so freely, that he had married beneath himself, if his Wife had been the Daughter of an Advocate of Paris? This Under-matching has something in it, which I cannot unravel, and which leaves room for Suspicion. Beza, as handsome as an Adonis (98), Polite, Learned, Witty, wanting no Money, under-matches himself! One of Those, who have answered Maimbourg's History of Calvinism, denies, that the Candida of Beza is one Dame Claudia, a Taylor's Wife; and, among other Reasons, He makes use of this; When Beza speaks of the Clasp, he complains, that coërcet globulos duos rubentes, intra cæca jubet manere claustra; These Expressions, says he, of a Woman's Breast, do not suit a Taylor's Wife (99). Who told him, that a Taylor's Wife of Paris might not wear a Clasp in Those Days, to hide her Breasts? This Apologist makes some minute Observations, which he would have done better to have suppressed.

I cannot give credit to what I have read in one of Mr Ancillon's Works, which is, that Beza's first Wife was Frances de St Marcel d'Avignon, Sister of a Bishop of Grenoble, and the Widow of Nicolas Odeuoud, Brother of John IV, First Consul of the same City of Grenoble, her first Husband, and of Philip de Poy, Lord of Fiance, her second Husband (100). Such an eminent Nobility cannot agree with the Under-matching, which the pretended Third Husband confesses so ingenuously. Besides, Mr Ancillon had not well informed himself of what concerns Beza's Marriages; He admits three of Them, and applies to them Pasquier's Epigram (101), which I have set down in the Remark [N].

[Z] He is charged with wishing to return into the Bosom of the Catholic Church.] See in the Remark [O], the Report, that was spread, of his dying a good Catholic, in the Year 1597. I have an Author to quote here, whose Name and Temper agree very well (102). "Did he not lately most humbly supplicate our most Christian King to obtain for him the Absolution of our Holy Father? The same Prince told it, two several times, to a Prelate; and I am sure he would not revoke it for all the Huguenotism in the World. Cry out, and murmur at it, as much as you will. The Sieur Corneille, a late Minister, told me, that the same Beza, advising him to forsake all their Errors, and return to the Faith of the Catholic Church, protested to him, that he would do the same, if he could easily get out of Geneva. If you have a Mind to know more of it, he will tell you the Day, the Place, and his Discourse, with so many Particulars, that you cannot doubt of it, &c." Thus the François Fœderatus speaks of Beza. One is amazed to see him quote Henry IV, with so much Confidence; as for the Ex-Minister, Corneille, his Quotation signifies nothing. Compare This with the Remark [R], towards the End.

[AA] It is not true, that a Dominican confounded him in a Dispute.] Alfonso Fernandez relates, in his Annals of the Dominicans, printed at Salamanca, in the Year 1617, that Father Sebastian Michael, a Religious of the Order of St Dominic, mortified the Pride of the Huguenots in Montpellier, and chiefly That of Beza, who travelled often from Geneva to Montpellier. Rivet says, upon This, that, at the Time of This pretended Triumph, Beza was in his Eighty first Year; and that he was not in a Condition to undertake long Journeys; and that it is certain, that, neither in that Year, nor after, did he set Foot out of the Territories of Geneva. "Cum tamen certum sit Bezam, tum octagesimum primum annum agentem, illo anno nec potuisse, si voluisset, Montem pessimum adventare, nec ab illo tempore Geneva excessisse, aut saltem fines Genevensium (103)." some Reformed Writers would have thrown in his Teeth his Audebert, and his Candida [BB]. Among the Roman Catholics, He, who treated him with the greatest Moderation, is more easy to be pointed out, than He, who treated him with the greatest Anger. They, who have shewn some Moderation and Equity towards him, are but a few in Number; They, who have discharged the Fury of their Animosities against him, are numberless: But I do not believe, there are many, whose Passion is so extravagant, as That of the Author of the Doctrines Curieuses. I shall mention one of his Calumnies [CC]: It is so strange, that one can hardly believe one's own Eyes in a Thing of this Nature. He was publicly censured for it by a Catholic Rivetus did not know, that, in the Year 1601, Beza went to Lausanne (105); he took, then, his final leave of That City.

[BB] Some Reformed Writers would have twitted him with his Audebert and his Candida. We should presume too much upon the Privileges of Orthodoxy, and belie Experience, if we should believe, that all Those, who write in the Defence of Truth, resist the Impressions of Repentment in such a Manner, as to see only, in the Writings of their Adversaries, what Justice requires they should find in Them. Beza's Epigram on Audebert is, at the bottom, but a witty Conceit; It is free from the Abominations, which the Missionaries pretend to discover in it; but, to see this Parity in it, one must either be the Author's Friend, or have no Partiality for, or against, him; for, when once a Man is very angry, and would be revenged for the Injuries he has received from an Author, He gives a criminal Turn to his Words. The Protestants of the Confession of Geneva do not doubt, but that Those of the Confession of Augsburg are Part of That True Church, which leads to Heaven: Nevertheless, some of the Lutherans were so offended, because Beza had written against their Party, that they adopted the Slanders of the Roman Catholics, as to his Juvenilia. See here a long Passage of the Calvino-Turcismus, in which we see the Sentiments of a famous Lutheran Divine. "Et quamquam Theodorus

"Beza aliter de vita moribusque Calvini scribat, tamen contra Theodorum Bezam isti argumentum hæc esse verissimum, nec unquam luculentum & solidum à Calvinistis refutatum. Nam quod ad Bezae testimonium attinet, quum Theodorus Beza (iniquum) * eadem hæresi, & eodem ferme peccato nobilitatus sit, ut historia de Candida meretricula (& Audeberto) testatur; nemo ipsi hac in parte fidem habere potest. Nihil certe apud hominem moderatum & æquum valere potest ejus quæcunque vehementissimum licet contestatio, si verum est quod juxta istos †, Certe constat Theodorum Bezam à pueritia imbibisse vatium impudiciam, & impudentiam, totamque ætatem explendis suis libidinibus & cupiditatibus, ac describendis suis amoribus, & ulciscendis suis rivalibus exercuisse, atque in meretricem lenam, & cynedum transformatum esse. De quo item constat & hoc ‡, quod obsecrissimos versus scripsit ad Germanum Audebertum Aureliæ, & eundem tanquam Adonidem à Theodoro Beza factum esse (106). — And, though Beza gives a different

"Account of the Life and Character of Calvin, yet They contend, against Theodore Beza, that these things are most true, and that they were never clearly and solidly refuted by the Calvinists. For, as to the Testimony of Beza, since Theodore Beza (Jay They) was remarkable for the same Herey, and almost the same Crime, as appears from the Story of the Harlot Candida (and Audebert); no one can believe him upon this Head. And, indeed, his strongest Attestation can have no weight with a Man of Moderation and Equity, if what They say be true; viz. It is notorious, that Beza, from his Infancy, had imbibed the Immodesty and Impudence of the Poets, and had spent his whole Life, in gratifying his lustful Inclinations, in describing his Amours, and revenging himself on his Rivals, and that he was metamorphosed both into a Bawd, and a Catamite. Of whom it is likewise true, that he wrote the most obscene Verses to Germanus Audebert, who is described by Theodore Beza as another Adonis. The same Blindness, which engaged Schlossbergius to write such things, would have appeared in some Reformed Authors, if Beza had followed the Footsteps of Claudius de Xaintes, or of Ronsard (107); if he had been Chaplain to the Duke of Guise at the Battle of Dreux; if he had harangued against The Protestants at the Conference of Poissy; in a word, if he had persecuted them by his Books, Intrigues, Sermons, Journeys, &c. Let us say, then, that the Glory, he acquired, in maintaining the Cause of the Reformed, with great Zeal, caused his Poems to be taken notice of, which, without That, had never been exclaimed against: And, if it were permitted to compare Small Faults with Great Ones (108), One might remember, here, what shall be said in another Place of John de la Cassa. His Capitolo del Forno would have remained unknown, with so many other more infamous Poems, if he had not been raised to the Function of an Inquisitor. To conclude, I add, that, if Beza had been a great Persecutor of the Huguenots, and exposed to their Libels for his Juvenilia, the Writers of the other Party would have maintained, that there was no harm in the Epigram upon Audebert and Candida, and that a Man must be given over to a Spirit of Slander, a perpetual Character of Herey, to, &c.

[CC] I shall mention one of Garasse's Calumnies against Beza. "The Fourth, who was guilty of a great Piece of Folly in relation to the Sacrament, was Beza; for This Man, who had Wit enough to make a lascivious Epigram, though he committed childish Faults in the Quantity of his Latin Verses, never spoke of any Thing relating to Divinity, without exposing himself to the Derision of the Learned. George Fabricius tells us, In response ad Apologiam Bezae, that the said Arch-Heretic, being at the Conference of Poissy, made a long Discourse, in the Form of a Paraphrase, on the Words of the Consecration, in which he equally shewed his Malice, and his Folly. For, said he, Sirs, I must inform you, that there is an essential Error crept into the New Testament, in the Words of the Consecration; for, whereas we read, Hoc est corpus meum; Hic est calix meus, it should certainly be read in the Negative; Hoc non est corpus meum; Hic non est calix meus †, and that CHRIST pronounced so in express Terms; but that the Evangelists, and St Paul, who were our LORD JESUS CHRIST'S Secretaries, have, unfortunately, or through too much Precipitation, forgotten the Negative, as it appears often, continues he, in the Pandects of Florence, and the Civilians observe, that Those, who transcribed them, have often forgot the Negative, and, by that means, made some Laws quite contrary to the Intention of the Founder: Thus, said Beza, the Evangelists, having forgotten the non, are the cause, that we debate, at this Day, a most clear Truth: For, what probability is there, that the Body of CHRIST should be contained in a little roundish Wafer? I say, Sirs, that Non plus est in COENA, quam in COENO; He is as much in the Mire, as in the Sacrament. At this Discourse, the Doctors, and particularly Episcopus, and Claudius de Xaintes, were in a manner stupified with Astonishment, seeing the Impudence and Folly of the Man: And Claudius de Xaintes to confound him having produced the Confession of Augsburg, which the Calvinists of France had embraced, which has these Words in express Terms: CHRISTI corpus in Eucharistia ADESSE: Beza answered, that it ought to be corrected; that the same Fault was in it, as in the Evangelists; and that, by changing one Letter, it might be read ADESSE; viz. that the Body of JESUS CHRIST was absent from the Eucharist (109). We shall see how This absurd

Catholic Writer [DD]: But he was not ashamed of it, and chose rather to make use

Discourse of Father Garasse was confuted by a Person of his own Communion.

[DD] He was publicly censured for it by a Catholic Writer.] I mean, by the same Mr Ogier, who wrote in favour of Balzac, some time after, and who was a very good Preacher. He did not put his Name to the Book, which he entituled, Jugement & Censure du Livre de la doctrine curieuse de François Garasse, and which he published at Paris, in the Year 1623. However, it is certainly known, that he was the Author of it. Never was Writer so bore down, or crushed by his Adversary, as Garasse was by Mr Ogier, in relation to This silly Story. The Censurer did two things: First, he shewed, by three Reasons, that nothing is more absurd, than to suppose, that Beza spoke in this Manner; and, afterwards, he proved, that the Witness, quoted by Garasse, did not say what was imputed to him.

Let us see his three Reasons. "Is it likely, that Beza, one of the chief Ministers of the Conference of Poissy, held such a Discourse, as Garasse fathers upon him, and said that we must read, Hoc non est corpus meum; since That cursed Corruption does not only ruin the Catholic Belief concerning the Holy Sacrament of the Eucharist; but also That of the Heretics, and of Beza, and his own Party. Certainly, if our Lord had said, This is not my Body; as the Catholics could not conclude the Reality of the Body from That Expression; so the Zuinglians could not draw Their Signification of Body from it; and much less the Calvinists their Flowings, Irradiations, Participations, of the Body of CHRIST, which They add to the Signification; since he would absolutely have said, This is not my Body. Add to this Consideration, that one must be, not only a Beast, as Garasse says, but worse than a Beast, more insensible than a Log, more stupid than a Lump of Lead, to entertain such a Thought, that our Lord JESUS CHRIST said, Hoc non est, &c. For cui bono? Wherefore should he tell his Disciples, that the Bread was not his Body, rather than any other Meat, that was on the Table; nay, rather than the Table itself? Besides, What Coherence, what Consequence, what Reasoning is there in These Words; This is not my Body, which is given for you; This is not my Blood, &c. without adding any explanatory Words, to denote which was That Body, and That Blood, which was to be given, and shed, for the Salvation of Mankind? As for myself, I own, that, though I consider these Words never so attentively, I cannot conceive any Reason, or Consequence, in Them; and I firmly believe, that one must be a Fool, and a Mad-Man, to be able to find any. Finally, Who will believe, that Beza made, at the Conference of Poissy, that fine Speech, which Garasse ascribes to him, who presented This Form of Confession concerning the Eucharist to the Bishops with his own Hands? Confitemur CHRISTUM JESUM in sua sancta Cæna nobis offerre, dare, & exhibere veram substantiam corporis & sanguinis per operationem Spiritus Sancti; --- We confess, that CHRIST JESUS, in the Eucharist, offers, gives, and exhibits to us the true Substance of Flesh and Blood, by the Operation of the Holy Spirit. And what follows; as may be read in the Answer of Claude de Xaintes to Beza's Apology. And, though These fine Words, so Orthodox in Appearance, vanish into airy Notions, and Figures; yet in what manner soever they be taken, they are inconsistent with That pretended Negative (110)."

(111) And not George, as Garasse had said, for which the Prior Ogier censures him.

He tells us, afterwards, of the Comparison he made between Garasse's Narrative, and That of the Civilian, Gabriel (111) Fabricius, whom Garasse had quoted for the Voucher of his Story. He relates, "That Francis Baudouin, alias Balduin, having deferted the Sect of the Calvinists, was, a long time, exposed to their Calumnies, and Curles. Besides, --- he composed very learned Treatises against Calvin's Doctrine, and, among others, a Preface to an Edition, which he published, of Optatus

Milevitanus, with this Supercription Joanne Lucano (112)." He adds (113); "If the Ministers hated This Civilian much, They feared him no less, because of his Ability, and profound Learning; infomuch that all the Works of the Catholic Doctors, wherein any Point of their Doctrine was solidly confuted, were ascribed by Them to Balduin. It happening, then, that Dr de Xaintes, afterwards Bishop of Evreux, having composed a Book entituled, Examen doctrine Calvinianæ & Bezanæ de Cæna Domini (114); Beza wrote an Apology by way of Answer to it, wherein he furiously inveighs against Balduin, as the chief Author of the Examen. De Xaintes answered by a Reply, entituled, Responsio ad Apologiam Theod. Bezae, &c. And, on the other side, Gabriel Fabricius undertook to defend his Master Balduin's Cause, and composed a Libel, entituled, Gab. Fabricii Responsio ad Bezanæ Vexillum Ecclesiam (115), which, to speak properly, is a Menippæan Satire, wherein he displays Beza in all his Colours, never calling him by any other than a Feminine Name, treating him, as the most lascivious and profligate Woman in the World, and using the keenest Strokes, that Satire can invent against an Enemy. It is out of This little Book, that Garasse --- took That Speech of Beza, at the Conference of Poissy, which might be tolerated, if Fabricius had made him harangue in the same manner, that Rapin makes Cardinal de Peltes discourse, in the Catholicon. But it is so far from being so, that there is nothing that looks like a Speech in all the Book. Fabricius says only, that Beza, without racking his Brain with so many Forms of Confession, Commentaries, and Explanations of this Passage, Hoc est corpus meum, should have said, with the utmost Boldness, that it is an Error of the Transcribers, who, instead of Hoc non est, as the Evangelists wrote it, have carelessly left out the Negative, and wrote Hoc est, &c. Here are Fabricius's own Words, in the seventeenth Page of my Copy. Et fortasse ut tandem te expedias, & tot commentariorum plaustra facessere jubear, recurras ad talem emendationem: Quia nostri correctores dicunt in ipsis etiam Pandedis Florentinis, sepe deesse negationem, tu tali artificio statim te liberares, & adversariis os obstruas, præstitem cum alios multos Evangeliorum locos similiter scilicet emendaris, partim ex conjectura, partim ex manuscriptis, ut ais, exemplaribus. From which Words it is as clear as the Sun at Noon-day, that Fabricius means This; Eum qui semel verecundia fines transferit, naviter oportere esse impudentem. --- That He, who has once transgressed the Bounds of Modesty, may persevere in Impudence: That, since Beza had the Assurance to corrupt the Scriptures in several Passages of less moment, He might carry his Impudence farther, and corrupt This Passage, Hoc est corpus meum, substituting, in the room of it, Hoc non est, &c. The following Imposture of Garasse is of the same Stamp, when he says, That Claudius de Xaintes, hearing Beza speak in This Manner, produced the Confession of Augsburg, to confound him, which has these Words, Christi corpus in Eucharistia adesse; and that Beza answered, that it ought to be read abesse. Garasse wonders at Beza's Folly; and I admire at Garasse's Stupidity, who hopes to make his Readers believe, that Beza, who would never subscribe to the Confession of Augsburg, notwithstanding all the Entreaties of the Cardinal de Lorraine, nor give his Opinion about That Confession, made This foolish and impertinent Reply to Dr de Xaintes. --- The Truth is, Fabricius derides Beza according to his usual Custom: Ubi id eviceris, says he, facile deinde efficias, quod præterea suscipis, ut persuadeas, tam fuisse bastenus temulentos omnes Protestantæ, &c. --- When you shall have proved This, you will then induce us to believe, what you farther suspect, that the Protestants have been hitherto, in general, so besotted, &c. And a little after; Ingenus profecto & ingenio use of a pitiful Shift, than to confess the Truth [EE]. I have read, somewhere, in his Works, that Sturmius affirmed, that Beza might truly say, I believe but one thing, which is, That I believe nothing (m). What Calumny is this! Prateolus must be reckoned among the Authors, who have been the most diligent Transcribers of the

(m) Note, that Beza, Apol. i. ad Claudium de Xaintes, Oper. Tom. II. pag. 224. said this of Francis Baudouin. Vix sane nullius fidei, ut tanquam alter Socrates verè polit illud usurpare, Hoc unum credo quod nihil crederet.

"fuerit illa tua emendatio, ut ubi in eorum de corna confessione scriptum est corpus adeste, scribatur abesse. Facilem enim lapsum ebrui scriptoris fuisse, in tanta affinitate unius literarum. Certainly, it would be an ingenious Correction, if instead of adeste, as the Confession of Augsburg has it, you should read abesse; and, if you should say, that it is an Error, easily crept into the Text, through the Carelessness of some drunken German, by reason of the Affinity and Resemblance between the two Letters, d and b (116)." You may be sure, This Censurer did not forget to insult Garasse for his Boldness in mentioning This Circumstance, that the Doctors, and particularly Bispenceus, and Claudius de Xaintes, were struck with Amazement. He ends with a very good Reflexion. "This way of proceeding, says be (117), is greatly prejudicial to the Conversion of Erring Souls, and particularly of Those, which Garasse pretends to bring over to the Church by means of his Book. For, pray tell me, what Heretic, what Atheist, would trust him, after he has been surprized in so manifest a Falshood? Who will not presume, that a thousand Absurdities, which he relates of several Heretical Authors, are of the same Stamp, and that he quotes the Ancients with as little Sincerity as the Moderns? - - - I have it from good Hands, that the chief Reason, which retained the great Cassaubon in the Errors, wherein he was brought up, was his having perceived the like Tricks in some modern Divines, which made him conceive a very bad Opinion of Those, who would triumph over their Enemies with false Colours."

ERRORS of Mr Ogier.

Let us observe some small Mistakes in This Judicial Censurer. The Reason, why the Protestants calumniated Baudouin, was not because he had forsaken Their Religion, and composed learned Works to confute Them. See the Remark [H] of his Article; where you will find, that he drew their Indignation upon him for having concerned himself with some Intrigues, wherein they thought there was a Design of destroying them, under Pretence of reconciling both Religions. You will find there, that they took him for the Author of a small Piece, which Cassander had written, and which was not a Book of Controversy, but rather an Explication of the Duty of a good Man in the Condition the Church was then in. In short, you will find there, that The Slanders preceded the Preface to Optatus Milevitanus. To these Faults of the Prior Ogier may be added these others. The Protestants imputed only the Anonymous Book of George Cassander to Baudouin. It is false, that Beza looked upon him as the chief Author of the Examen Doctrinae Calvinianæ, written by Claude de Xaintes; He was contented to say, that Baudouin had supplied This Doctor with some Things, which consisted much more of Matters of Fact, than Arguments.

[EE] He chose rather to make use of a pitiful Shift, than to confess the Truth. First of all, he supposes, that the Question is only, Whether Fabricius spoke those Words seriously, or by way of Irony (118)? He confesses afterwards, that his Adversary builds on the seventeenth Page of Fabricius's Book; and then he expresses himself thus: "Not to multiply Words in vain, I answer, that, not having Fabricius's Book at present in my Possession, I can't verify the Passage, and not being able to procure it, what Diligence soever I could use, I must refer myself to the Truth of my Extracts, which I made very punctually above twelve Years ago; by which I perceive, that Monsieur Ogier did, out of Simplicity or Cunning, what the Ministers do maliciously in the Books of the ancient Fathers; for he took one Part of the Passage, which was favourable to him, and dropped the other. - - - To prove, then, that Fabricius did not speak ironically, and that he did not falsely accuse Beza of having substituted a Negative in

"the sacred Words of the Evangelists, he shews evidently, in the Sequel of his Discourse, that Beza's Belief was such, and that he had certainly corrupted the Passages of the Gospel. These are his Words, which deserve to be seriously considered. Ipse Illyricus de illa explicatione & inventione Bezana loquens, vocat phantasticam inventionem, qualis est amantium in Pictura & Poësi, ut ibi suos amores esse somniet, ubi non sunt. Illam absens absentem auditque videtque; & ita, inquit Illyricus, se cum CHRISTO in Eucharistia Beza gessit, ut Phædrus cum Thaide apud Tarentum, cum ait; Volo ut cum milite illo præsens absens fies & mecum tota sis; Ita Beza sua illa phantastica & imaginosa inventione vult ut CHRISTUS in Eucharistia præsens & absens fies, & ita sit ut non esse dicatur. - - - The Illyrian himself, speaking of This Explication and INVENTION of Beza, calls it a fantastical Invention, like That of Lovers, in Painting or Poetry, who fancy the beloved Object to be, where it is not. Thus, said be, Beza dealt with CHRIST in the Eucharist, as Phædrus, in Terence, does with Thais, when she says; Though in Company with This Soldier, I would have you be absent, and only present with me. Thus Beza, in That fantastical and imaginary Discovery, would have CHRIST to be present in Absence, and so to exist, as to be said not to exist. Monsieur Ogier may plainly see by these Words, that Fabricius, whom he represents to us as a Buffoon, purposely to lessen his Authority, did not speak jestingly, as he supposes, but with all the Seriousness, which such Matters deserve (119)." The Insincerity, which reigns in these Words of Father Garasse, cannot be sufficiently represented. An indigent Layman, living in a Place remote from great Cities, might make use of This Excuse, I could not procure such a Book; I could not verify such a Passage; but, if he lived at Paris, and if his Honour engaged him to justify a Quotation, there would be reason to laugh at This Excuse, and to call it a Cheat. But Garasse was, then, at Paris; so that he might easily have found Fabricius's Book; and no Author was ever more obliged to purge himself from Calumny. It was therefore prodigious Confidence, and invincible Obstinacy, to say, I could not find This Book, what Diligence soever I used. What! Shall a Jesuit, who can be supplied by the Libraries of his Order, in the furthestmost Part of a Province, with any Book he stands in need of, tell us, that he could not find, at Paris, the Work he quoted? His Adversary could meet with it there, and does not say, that he used any Diligence to find it. Why had he not Recourse to That Copy, if all other Helps failed him? Mr Ogier durst not have refused him; His Refusal would have been a Proof of Garasse's Innocence. There is something worse still; This Jesuit took a Passage of Fabricius out of his Collections, and gave it as the Sequel of That, which his Adversary had mentioned; I say, as a Sequel artificially suppressed by his Adversary. But it appears plainly, that Mr Ogier suppresses nothing, and that Fabricius's Words, which Francis Garasse quoted, relate to another Thing. What would have become of him, if the Reply, which Mr Ogier was going to make, had not been stopped by the Reconciliation between them? Would he have found new means to have dispensed with himself from fairly acknowledging his Calumny, Rashness, Imposture, and Impudence?

(119) Ibid. pag. 350.

I shall say it often; I shall not be weary of repeating it; It is very useful to collect Examples of the Insincerity of Authors, and the Pieces, which it has occasioned. It were to be wished, that such Men, as Langius and Gruterus, had spent Part of the Time they bestowed upon Polyanthea's, in making such Compilations. Garasse would have often appeared in them; He was a Satirical, Hot-headed, Scurrilous, and Rash Man, who told a Lie boldly, and denied it afterwards. It was his Interest, that the the abusive Language against This Minister. He omitted nothing of what Surius, and such like Writers, had collected (n). Cardinal Richelieu made use, in his Method, of some of Their Rhapsodies. I shall remark against him [FF]. Let us not forget, that Beza was buried in St Peter's Cloyster, and not in the Burying-place of Plain-palaix, because the Savoyards had boasted, that they would take him up, and send him to Rome (o). La Faye says, that This was done for some Reasons, which it was not necessary to mention. The Feuillant Peter de St Romuald brings a ridiculous Charge against him, when he accuses him of Rebellion, in having filed Queen Elizabeth Queen of France [GG].

Doctrine of Those, who hold, that a Man, who dies in the Service of People infected with the Plague, is a Martyr, should be true. See Theophilus Raynaud, in the Treatise de Martyrio per Pestem. He says, that Father Garasse was persuaded, by the reading That Book, that the Crown of Martyrdom was to be obtained by that means, and was induced thereby to expose himself to the Danger of the Plague (120). He died in That Manner; and had published so many Calumnies, and discovered so much Knavery, that scarce any Thing but a true Martyrdom could expiate such Crimes. Observe, that some Persons will rather sacrifice their Lives, than a false Point of Honour; Garasse would not own his Calumnies upon any Account, and made no Difficulty to shut himself up with Those, who had the Plague (121).

[FF] A Remark against Cardinal Richelieu. Let us first set down his Words. "Beza, being an Ecclesiastic, and in Possession of some Benefices, forsook the Church of Rome, at the time when the Parliament summoned him to appear before them, about an extremely wanton and scandalous Poem * he had composed; but, knowing himself to be guilty of such great Excesses, he answered that August Senate only by his Flight, and retired to Geneva †. To learn what he was, we need no other Witness than himself, having discovered, by the Verses, which he made in Imitation of Catullus and Ovid, that he had given himself up to an enormous and monstrous Lewdness (122), for which reason, his own Fraternity call him The Shame of France, a Simonist, a Man guilty of all Vices, and even of That, which drew Fire from Heaven ‡."

This is what The Cardinal says, in the tenth Chapter of the second Book of his Method, pages 321, 322, of the Edition of Paris, 1663. Mr Martel, Professor of Divinity at Montauban, and at Puy-laurens, before the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and, since That Revocation, at Bern, opposes the Testimony of Stephen Pasquier against These Words of the Cardinal, and adds, That it is not a Frenchman, who called Beza a Simonist, and a Sodomite. It is Costerus, a Flemish Writer and a Jesuit. I cannot tell by what Rhetorical Figure they pretend to rank him among the Fraternity of our Ministers (123). As for what he says of Costerus, he refers us to the Twenty first Chapter of the second Book of the first Part of Morton's Catholic Apology; where, it is certain, the Latin Words, quoted by the Cardinal, Gallie probrum, &c. are to be found, as taken from the first Chapter of the third Book of One of Costerus's Works. This Cardinal, or Those, who published his Method, cannot be excused for This false Quotation: They found it necessary, that the Name of a Reformed Writer should appear next to the Gallie probrum, &c. For, though it should be proved, that Costerus's Words are to be seen in the Writings of the Lutheran Schlusfeldburgius, it would not justify them; since it is very evident, that That Lutheran cannot pass for one of Beza's Fraternity. As for what remains, it must be confessed, that a Flemish Jesuit was not the First, who charged Beza with such Abominations. Costerus did but transcribe several Frenchmen, and by name, Claudius de Saintes. A Chronological Mistake of the Cardinal might be taken notice of: He says, in a Marginal Note, that Beza retired to Geneva, in the Year 1554, aged Fifty five Years (124). He should have said, in the Year 1548, being Twenty nine Years of Age.

[GG] Peter de St Romuald ridiculously accuses him of Rebellion, in styling Queen Elizabeth Queen of France. "This same Year, 1581, says he (125), Theodore Beza, Minister of Geneva, published his Book, entitled, Icones Virorum illustrium pietate & doctrina, which he dedicated to Elizabeth, Queen of England, styling her Queen of France. Certainly, a Frenchman cannot use such Terms, without declaring himself a bad Subject; for it is saying, that the King, his Master, is an Usurper, and that the Crown does not belong to him, but to another. Can This be done in a printed Book, without Felony and Treason? But what better can we expect from an Heretic?" He has repeated the same Charge, Word for Word, in another Book (126); which proves, that he was thoroughly satisfied with This Remark: which, however, is childish, nonsensical, and superstitious. I excuse him Errors of Fact; such as, that the Icones of Beza came out in 1581, and that they were dedicated to the Queen of England. It was to James, King of Scotland, that the Author dedicated Them, the first of March 1580; and it is the Year 1580, which I find marked in my Copy: But if our Feuillant is to be pardoned for such Mistakes, as These, he cannot be excused the Error of Right, into which he is fallen. I confess, that Beza, in dedicating his Remarks on the New Testament to Queen Elizabeth, gives her the Title of Angliae, Franciae, Hiberniae, & circumjacentium Insularum Regina: but it is absurd to pretend, that This is felonious and treasonable, and that the King of France is thereby determined to be an Usurper. For I. Beza ought not to be considered, at That Time, as a Subject of the King of France: he had renounced his Country for the Sake of his Religion, and had taken Shelter in foreign Lands: he was become a Citizen of Geneva, and actually exercised, there, the Office of Professor, and Minister. II. A Private Person, who, in a Letter, gives Princes the Titles, which they usually assume, does not set himself up as a Judge of their Pretensions; he does but follow the Usage, which he finds established; and, when he complies with the Formulary of Subscriptions, he does not engage himself to examine, whether such or such Titles are justly assumed, or no. I go further, and say, III. that, even when we doubt whether a Prince has a Right to a Kingdom, we yet observe the Usage of Subscriptions, in an Epistle Dedicatory, or other Letter. Beza, for example, fully persuaded, that Charles IX., and Henry III., lawfully possessed France, yet gives Elizabeth the Titles, which the assumed in England. It is, therefore, the utmost impertinence, to conclude, that he treated the King of France as an Usurper. In the IV, and last, place, I say, that Usage, or Custom, authorizes Those, who give the same Titles to Possessors, and Pretenders, and that the Latter, 'till they have renounced their Titles, and Pretensions, are called Kings, or Lords, of such a Country, at the same time that the actual Possessors are acknowledged as Kings, or Lords, of the same Country. We have, among other Examples, the Conduct, which France observed towards Uladislas King of Poland, and Gustavus Adolphus King of Sweden. We were in strict Alliance with the One, and even as King of Sweden; yet we did not scruple to give the other the Title of King of Sweden. Mr le Laboureur has inserted, in his Account of Poland (127), a Letter, which was written by the King of France to King Uladislas, the Twenty fourth of November 1645, at the time when there was such strict Friendship between Queen Christina, and France. The Subscription of the Letter is; To the most High, most Excellent, and most Mighty Prince, our dear and well-beloved Cousin, The King of Poland and Sweden. A Spanish Author, who, in dedicating a Book to the most Christian King, tiled him King of France and Navarre, would not, I believe, be called to an Account for it, in a Time of Amity. Nor do I think, the Grand Signior would be such a Turk, as to punish a Greek Bishop, who, in writing to the Duke

(127) Part I, pag. 14.

I am surprized, that Balzac quarrels with certain anonymous Persons on the same Account [HH].

Duke of Savoy, should call him King of Cyprus, or, in writing to the King of Spain, should stile him King of Jerusalem; and who, in case of an Accusation, should reply, that he had innocently followed the Usage of Inscriptions, without intending to derogate, in the least, from the Fidelity, which he owed his Highness. Is there any Prince in Christendom, who does not acknowledge Two Kings of Navarre; One in France, and the Other in Spain; the One only titular, the other in actual Possession? Does This give occasion for Complaints, or Threats? Would an Englishman be prosecuted, who, in an Epistle Dedicatory to Lewis XIV. should stile him King of France, or King of the French, which is the same Thing? Are not the Kings of France so stiled, in England, not only in common Conversation, but even in Histories, and Public Acts?

[HH] I am surprized, that Balzac quarrels with some anonymous Persons, on the same Account. I shall produce his Words, without refuting them; since That is sufficiently done in the preceding Remark. "Let Those, who have lost Countries, flatter themselves with Those, which they retain. It may serve by way Amusement, or Play-Thing, formed by the Imagination, after the loss of essential Things. It would be cruelly to refuse their Grief this light Consolation. Queen Elizabeth of England may stile herself Queen of France, and the English may speak the Language of their

"Mistress. Let them, if They please. But I cannot allow Frenchmen to talk thus. It was well said by a Frenchman, speaking of King James, Successor of Elizabeth: He has certainly too much of a Name, or too little of a Kingdom; and, if the King of France be at London, whom will he send Embassadors to at Paris? However, as it is every where the Custom to speak improperly, and as every Thing in the World is a Farce, This may be allowed among the rest. But it must be plaid in England, and not in France, or Places under the Protection of France. A Frenchman cannot use such Terms, without forgetting, that he is a Frenchman, without declaring himself a bad Subject, without saying, that the King his Master is an Usurper. Publicly to degrade his Prince, to give his Crown to another Prince by a solemn and printed Acknowledgment, can This be done without the Crime of Felony? I think not, Sir! and, for fear of putting myself farther into a Passion, let us change the Discourse (128)." I fancy he glances at Theodore Beza, and that Peter de St Romuald has only transcribed him.

It will not, perhaps, be improper to remark, that Noel Beda had before had the same Quarrel with Erasmus, on account of the Dedication of One of his Books to the King of England. See the Remark [B] of the Article BEDA, Citation (11).

(128) Balzac, Entree, xii. pag. 324, 325.

BIBLIANDER (THEODORUS), Professor of Divinity at Zurich, in the XVIth Century, was born at Bischoffzell (a), near St Gal, in Switzerland. He was an universal Scholar (b); but he excelled chiefly in the Exposition of the Scripture. He was Professor of Divinity at Zurich, from the Year 1532, to 1560, and died of the Plague in the same City, the Twenty fourth of September 1564 (c). If any one asks, Why his Professorship ended before his Life? I answer, That it was, because he stirred certain Questions, which caused some Disturbances [A], in which he departed too much from the common Doctrine of the Protestants, about Predestination. To prevent the Schism, which might have arisen from too long a Contest upon Those Points, it was thought proper to declare Bibliander Emeritus; I mean, to treat him as a Veteran, and to give him to understand, that his Age, and his long Services, required, that, as a Reward, They should grant him a quiet Life, and an honourable Dismission. I cannot tell whether he apprehended the true meaning of this Compliment, or whether it vexed him; but I know, that he left off teaching. As he understood the Oriental Languages, he set about a new Edition of the Koran, the Text of which he corrected according to the Rules of Criticism, by comparing the Arabic and Latin Copies together. He added to it the Life of Mabomet, and his Successors, and an Apologetical Preface, which raised a great Outcry [B]. He published several other

[A] He stirred certain Questions, which caused some Disturbance. Pantaleon has not specified These Questions; he says only, They were little agreeable to the common Opinion, and that Bibliander lost Part of his Authority upon That Account. Pantaleon scribit ante obitum motas ab ipso fuisse questiones quasdam novas & insolentes unde auctoritati aliquid decesserit, sed quales illæ fuerint questiones, non addit (1). But Henry Alting has not expressed himself in general Terms; He says, that Bibliander had embraced Erasmus's Errors concerning Predestination, and that, for this Reason, Those of Zurich discharged him from the Functions of his Office, under Pretence, that his Old-age made him unfit for it, and put Peter Martyr in his Place (2). This latter Fact is not to be contested, under Pretence, that Peter Martyr was called to Zurich in the Year 1556, to succeed Pelican. He might have been Professor at Zurich for some Years, and yet succeed Bibliander; for all Professors of Divinity have not the same Functions assigned them. See, below, the Remark [E], at the end.

[B] He added, to the Version of the Koran, an Apologetical Preface, which raised a great Outcry.]

The Title of it is, Apologia ad reverendissimos patres ac dominos, episcopos & doctores Ecclesiæ Christianæ, in qua rationes redduntur editionis voluminis quod continet Alcoranum & ejus consutationes, & vitas Mahumetis atque successorum ipsius. This Work was printed by Oporin, in the Year 1543, in Folio (3). Bibliander corrected the Text of the Koran, by comparing the Latin and Arabic Manuscripts together, and made some Marginal Notes, which shew, or refute, the Absurdities of That Book. This did not hinder the Spanish Inquisitors from condemning This Edition of the Koran; They condemned not only the Prefaces, but the Koran itself (4). This is as clear as the Day; and yet some Authors say, that They only condemned the impious Prefaces, and the pernicious Notes, which are in Bibliander's Edition. Father Theophilus Raynaud maintains, that the Koran itself deserves to be proscribed, and shews, that Starellus, who says, that the Index forbids the reading of it, only because of the Pieces, which Bibliander added to it, argued but weakly (5). I set down That Jesuit's Remark somewhat at length, that the Reader may have a more particular Notion of Bibliander's Design. We shall see, that This Minister did other Books [C], and composed a great many, which were never printed, the Manuscripts whereof are kept in the Library of Zurich (d). He had a hand in a Translation of the Scripture (e). I have endeavoured in vain to find out what Age he was old when he died: I give no Credit to Melchior Adam; and I wonder he was not sensible of his Error [D]. Moreri relates very ill what he takes from Thuanus, concerning Bibliander [E].

did not think it proper, that the Books of Adversaries should be destroyed. "Tractans hoc punctum Antonius Sanctarellus Traët. de hæresi, c. 14. dub. unico, propositione 7. ait, Alcoranum per se non prohiberi, sed ratione scholiorum impiorum, notarumque ac præstationum Lutheri ac Melanchtonis, quibus Basiliensis editio Alcorani, per Theodorum Bibliandrum damnatæ memoriæ scriptorum adornata, contaminatur. Hoc verè & rectè autor ille. Et addere æquè poterat, ipsius Bibliandri Apologiam, qua Alcorano patrocinatus est, dignissimam fuisse quæ confingeretur. Omnium quippe librorum prohibitorum indemnitate studet meribulbus ille, usque adeò, ut non erubuerit contra Theodosii & Valentiniani Imperatorum legem de comburendis Nestorii libris grunnire. Hæc igitur concedo Sanctarellus. Sed addit quæ everti videantur quæ sic sunt constituta; addit enim rationem, cur Alcoranus prohibeatur, esse, quia in eo agitur de Religione nationis, hoc tempore maximè potentis, & ad corporum voluptates patentissimum ostium apertius; quæ sunt valida corruptelæ illeclamenta. Hæc, inquam, ratio monstrare videtur, Alcoranum non vetari tantum ratione impiarum Bibliandri annotationum, vel ratione Præstationum Lutheri ac Melanchtonis, sed per se ac ratione contentis ipsiusmet Alcorani, quo Apostasie hami, quos diximus, apponuntur (6). - - - Antonius Sanctarellus, handling This Point, in his Treatise of Heresy, chap. 14. Prop. 7. says, that the Koran is not prohibited on it's own Account, but by reason of the impious Scholia, Notes, and Prefaces, of Luther and Melanchthon, which deserve the Basil Edition of the Koran, by Theodore Bibliander of accursed Memory. This is justly and truly observed by This Author. And he might, with equal Justice, have added, that the Apology of Bibliander himself, in which he patronizes the Koran, was most worthy of Censure. For This Sat pleads for the Indemnity of all prohibited Books, so far as impudently to arraign the Edit of the Emperors Theodosius and Valentinian for the burning of Nestorius's Books. Thus far, then, Sanctarellus is right. But he adds, what seems to overthrow This Determination. For he adds, that the Reason, why the Koran is prohibited, is, because it treats of the Religion of a Country, at This Time very powerful, and which opens a wide Door to corporeal Pleasures, the Source of all Corruption. This Reason, I say, seems to prove, that the Koran is not only forbidden on account of the impious Annotations of Bibliander, or the Prefaces of Luther and Melanchthon, but on it's own Account, on Account of the very Text of the Koran, on which The Hooks of Apostasy, which I have spoken of, hang."

[C] He published several other Books. Here are the Titles of some of Them: Evangelica Historia, quam scripsit B. Marcus, &c. una cum vita Johannis Marci Evangelistæ collecta ex probatoribus auctoribus, at Basil, 1551. He added to it the Protevangeli-um Jacobi, for which he was censured. Expeditio vaticinii de restitutione Israël, de instauranda urbe Jerusalem & Templi, terræque dividenda rursus in tribus, quod ultimis octo capitibus Ezechielis legitur. This Work was inserted in the Commentaries of Pelican on the Scripture. Purgatio scriptorum Joannis Occolampadii, & Ulrici Zuinglii, qua & acta eorum obiter defenduntur contra calumniatores. This Piece was printed before Zuinglius's Works. De satis Monarchia Romanæ summum Vaticanum Esæ Prophetæ explicatum non conjectatione privata, sed demonstratione Theologica, Historica & Mathematica. At Julius III Papam & ceteros Ecclesiæ Romanæ præfides consideratis de Judeorum & Christianorum defectione à Christo, & Ecclesiæ & fide Catholica: itemque de Judeorum & Christianorum conversione ad Christum Jesum, & Ecclesiam Dei sanctam & fidem Catholicam, at Basil 1553. De summa Trinitate & fide Catholica, at Basil 1555. De mysteriis salutiferæ passionis, & mortis Jesu Messie: expositionis historice, libri tres, in the same Place, 1555.

[D] I wonder Melchior Adam was not sensible of his Error. He affirms, that Bibliander was born in the Year 1514 (7), and that, at last, he died very old, in the Year 1564, valde senex. Can this be said of a Man of fifty Years of Age? He adds, that his poring too much on Books had so weakened his Sight, that, coming one Morning into his Stove, in his declining Age, and seeing his Cat playing on a Table, he took her to be his Maid, and bid her good-morrow. "Ex nimis studiis ætate declivi-αυλαυτορίας contraxit. Accidit ergo ut aliquando, cum diluculo surrexisset, hypocautum ingressus, feli in mensa gesticulanti, ancillam suam esse ratus, faustum fuerit diem precatus, quem felis, ut potuit, resalutavit. A fine Circumstance, and most worthy to be transmitted to future Ages?

[E] Moreri relates very ill what he borrows from Thuanus. I. It is not true, that Thuanus places Bibliander's Death on the Twenty ninth of November: He makes use of this Expression; VI Kalend. Decembris; which signifies the Twenty sixth of November. II. It is true, that he speaks of Leo the Jew. He made use of these Words, Leo Juda, which must be translated Leo Juda, or Leo of Juda. But it is very true, that Bibliander was One of Those, who put the last Hand to the Bible of Leo Juda, to That Bible, which is called the Zurich Bible, and which was printed in That City in the Year 1543. Leo Juda had advanced very far in the Latin Translation of the Scripture when he died; and he made his Colleagues promise, that they would finish This Work. Quem Leo Juda inchoaverat, & moriens ut opus persequeretur Collegis in fidem religiose additis transcripserat (8). Bibliander translated the last eight Chapters of Ezekiel, Daniel, Job, Ecclesiastes, the Songs of Songs, and the Forty eight Psalms, which remained to be translated. Peter Cholin made the Translation of the Greek Books, which the Protestants call Apocrypha (9). It is of Cholin only, that Thuanus says, he understood the Greek Tongue very well. Bibliander Chunredi Pellicani & Petri Cholini Tugienfis Græcæ linguæ peritissimi opera adjutus. Moreri does not translate This well by These Words; Bibliander, assisted by Conrad Pelican, and by Peter Cholin, two learned Men in the Greek Tongue. This is his third Fault. The fourth is much more considerable. A long time after, says he, the Spanish Divines caused This Bible of Zurich to be reprinted at Lyons, having been revised by William Roville (10). Here are Thuanus's Latin Words; Hispani Theologi diu post recognitam per Gulielmum Rovillum denno Lugduni excudendam curaverunt. William Roville is the Printer of Lyons, whom Those Divines employed; but it was not He, who revised the Translation, but the Spanish Divines themselves. Father Simon makes no mention of This Edition of Lyons; He says, that the Divines of Salamanca caused This Bible to be reprinted in fair Characters at Salamanca, and made very small Alterations in it (11). It is no wonder, that honest Mr du Rier, of the French Academy, has ill translated Cicero, Seneca, and Livy, since he has committed so many Faults in translating Thuanus. For Moreri does but transcribe du Rier's Translation in This Place. As for what Thuanus says, that John Stuckius was put in Bibliander's Place, This neither agrees with Alting, who says, that Peter Martyr succeeded Bibliander; nor with Hottin-ger, who says, that Josias Simler succeeded him for a time (12); and that Stuckius, having been some time the Substitute of James Ammien, Professor of Rhetoric, and Logic, was ordinary Professor of Divinity, from the Year 1571, to the Year 1607 (13). It is certain,

(7) If this were so, it would have been extraordinary, that he had been made Professor of Divinity in the Year 1532; but no one observes it.

tain, that, when Bibliander resigned his Professorship, Stuckius, a young Man of eighteen Years of Age, was, then, in France (14). He was at Paris the Year following, where he received a Commission to join with Peter Martyr in the Conference of Poissi. He continued a long time in France; afterwards he went into Italy; and he did not begin to have any Academical Offices at Zurich, before the Year 1568. Nevertheless, it is affirmed, in his Life, that he succeeded Bibliander in the Office of Professor of the Old Testament (15). This was in the Month of February, 1571. Bibliander had been dead a long Time. No matter for That; his Office continued vacant many Years: There are many Examples of This. Tuanus is not so exact in This Point, as he should have been; for all his Readers will believe, that Stuckius was made Professor of Divinity in the Year 1564. He should have told us, what Year Stuckius had This Professorship conferred upon him.

[F] That he lived Sixty Years.] This we find in the German Edition of the Profopographia (16), not in the Latin Edition (17) where we see on the contrary, that he died in the Year 1560, being about fifty Years old. Pantaleon discovered this Error, and corrected it in the German Edition.
